Think big pdf

Think great! It was a retail store originally founded in New York City in 1979. It closed in 1994. Think great! The store's history logo was a joint effort by two friends, artist Phyllis Prinz and a business man Robert Malkin. The two, who had the proximity to collecting large antique display pieces, opened their store against the advice of friends and experts. The line started with a small offering consisting of a giant 6-foot pencil and replica of Crayola's giant 5-foot crayola crayon. [1] Entrepreneurs have had great success and expanded into a nationwide retail catalogue concept. Think great! The product line grew to provide more than 100 different objects larger than life. With the added success of selling catalogues many franchise locations began to open nationwide as pop art styles caught through the 1980s. Unique creations have been featured in many films, including Forrest Gump and Big, both played by Tom Henox. Think great! Catalogues think big flourished in the 1980s, when aesthetics scaled up to be popular. Other companies such as Swatch also created large comic versions of their drugs. In the early 1990s the retailer was at its peak and sold to high-end art gallery company Martin Lawrence Gallery. The gallery has already had many retail locations and attracted the interest of pop art fans with its large collection of Andy Warhol and Roy Lichtenstein artwork. However, think big franchise stores are starting to disappear, subject to high-rent retail locations and increased costs for catalogue production. By 1994, all think Big retail locations had been shut down by Martin Lawrence Galleries. [2] Warhol Art Gallery's collection was in decline and the economy stagnated. Gallery off the last great think! Catalogued in 1994 and again focused on expanding its collection of high-end art involving a wider variety of printed artworks. After about 5 years of hibernation, think big's product line rejuvenated with the internet boom and Jeff Braut's determination when he founded GreatBigStuff. GreatBigStuff is a single online retailer of large versions of everyday objects. In 2001, Berut placed a former presenter, Martin Lawrence, who had owned think Big's remaining inventory since 1994 and worked on a business contract - three of Berut's personal Warhol in exchange for all the remaining inventory. GreatBigStuff has since redesigned and revived many of the original think-big products.
