This region of the planet has great landscape and cultural diversity. These elements contributed to a subdivision of the continent: Mediterranean Africa and sub-Saharan Africa. When it comes to addressing this topic in the classroom, the use of the world map is of fundamental importance, in addition to the map of the division of the African continent, since these materials will allow the location of the countries covered. Start the content by explaining that Africa has a great physical, ethnic and cultural diversity. Then cite that the continent, because of these differences, can be divided into two regions: Mediterranean Africa, located in the northern part, bathed by the Mediterranean sea and with a majority Muslim population and sub-Saharan Africa, occupies the central-south part and with great ethnic-cultural diversity. It is notable that this regionalization, in addition to the cultural elements, has as a decisive factor the Sahara desert, which is considered a natural partition. Mediterranean Africa, located north of the Sahara desert, accounts for 25% of the continental territory, consisting of only five countries: Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Libya and Egypt.Do not stop now ... It's more after the publicity ;) It is important to explain that Mediterranean Africa was dominated by the Arab peoples in the 7th and 8th centuries. Thus, this part of Africa bears similarities to the Middle East. It then clears that sub-Saharan Africa occupies most of the African continent (75%). This region, located south of the Sahara desert, has a large cultural majority, with various dances, religions (Christianity, Judaism, Islam, as well as traditional faith) and distinct ethnic groups. This is the region with the worst socioeconomic indicators on the planet. Then you can request a group work (up to 3 people) in which each team must present the different points and similarities between Mediterranean Africa and sub-Saharan Africa. To this do this, students pesquisar or processo de colonizacao, culture, economy, social aspects, ethnic conflicts and physical characteristics. By Wagner de Cerqueira e Francisco Graduado em Geografia Equipe Brasil Escola Geografia - Estratégias de Ensino - Educador - Brazil Escola Concepts Sub-Saharan Africa and former Black Africa refers to the countries of the African continent that do not border the Mediterranean. It is also known as a specific geographical area located south of the Sahara Desert. However, there is no reference to political divisions; The term refers to the parts of the African continent inhabited mainly by dark-skinned people, which make up about 85 percent of their total area. Another classification marks the tropics of cancer as the approximate northern border of black Africa. From a biogeographic point of view, it is called the Afrotropic region. Geographical map of Africa showing the ecological border that determines the region called sub-Saharan Africa, which does not match the current borders of African countries or their ethnic origin. Black Africa is mainly the eastern zone, the cradle of the human species, from which the earth's population began (probably in Ethiopia or Tanzania). [1] It has vast mining riches such as oil, copper, gold, tin, cobalt, chromium, uranium, coltan and diamonds, and enormous energy, solar, wind, river and biofuel potential. Today, however, Black Africa is generally considered the most artificially impoverished region on the planet, suffering the severe legacies of colonialism, neocolonialism, ethnic conflicts and political instability. In this region, the countries on the planet with the lowest incidence of human development.[2] but by 2007 it was able to move forward and position itself as a region with average human development (0514), but still has major structural weaknesses, with a few exceptions. The story of the term Since the nineteenth century this territory began to become known to Westerners with the phrase Black Africa, describing an area inhabited by black people, and which had not been explored or colonized by Europeans (between 1950 and 1975 decolonization occurred). This term became disuse in the 1970s and 1980s, replacing itself with the controversial period of sub-Saharan Africa. [3] The term Black Africa has now been reclaimed, mainly by Africans themselves, philosophers and Pan-African activists and African centrist theorists. The very concept of sub-Saharan Africa is seen by intellectuals from the area denoting it as a Eurocentric, not equivalent african reality. This thesis is based, among other things, on the effect that apartheid South Africa, clearly sub-Saharan Africa, was not included in sub-Saharan Africa, although it fell within this term when the African National Congress took power. [4] By 1990, people living in extreme poverty were 57%. In 1999, poverty increased to 58%. But in 2005, poverty fell to 51% and is likely to have fallen to 41% in 2008. The region has had a stagnant economy that has lasted from the mid-1970s to the mid-1990s. Although the growth in many economies in sub-Saharan Africa has been greater than many of the advanced economies, growth has historically been less effective at reducing poverty in this region than elsewhere. [quote required] The Black African Nations Political Map reflects the ecological division of the African continent. There are 49 countries in the black African region, but especially Mauritania and to a lesser extent Sudan is considered borderland between Black Africa and North Africa or the Mediterranean, and six of the 49 countries have the status of island states. The latter includes Madagascar, seychelles, Comoros, Cape Verde and Sao Tome and Principe and Mauritius.
