41 bus route seattle

Photo: Angel TorresLightless shrug off bus travel if you can fly it on trains or rent a car, but bus travel almost always has a distinct advantage: it's dirt cheap. If you are travelling to the UK anytime soon, check out the bus routes. You can see a singal portion of the country for less than $90 (not including airfare and accommodation). Wanderu, one of the easiest ways to book affordable ground travel, has recently expanded its coverage read moreWanderu, the app that helps you find cheap bus and train tickets, found a bus travel loop that hits London, Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, and Leeds for every about £60 back and forth. Since it's a loop, you can start exploring every city you like and then start exploring. Here's a map of the excursion: And here's a breakdown of what each bus fare costs: London Birmingham: £14.05 or $19.66 Birmingham to Liverpool: £13.70 or $19.18 Liverpool: £5.0.00 47 or 7.65 $Manchester in Leeds: £8.57 or £11.99 $Leeds to London: $17.95 or £25.13 $£2 brings the total to $83.61, not including airfare or accommodation. Of course, i'm sorry. The prices they calculate based on the average bus fares in Wanderu found on each route over a 30-day period, though, so these numbers can fluctuate. Still, if it stays in a similar price range, it's incredibly cheap to be able to travel between five different major cities. I've had surge-out Uber rides cost more than that! You can also find out more about the routes below, including the best ticket purchases and the busiest days. Seemingly moments after the first real augmented reality app hit Apple's iTunes App Store, more arrived. One is a London version similar to the first Parist Metro app, and the other from Yelp, the customer-focused business review portal. Both snon under Apple's radar. Presselite people have received an email about their London Bus app, which aims to help people navigate the iconic and amazingly expansive London bus network. For the Paris Metro app an augmented reality layer has also been smuggled in in the latest update to the existing app. Watch the demo video below: It works pretty much as expected: There's a one Augmented reality view shows interesting sites closer than 1km from your current location and a compass-like navigation prompt. The app is already in the app store, and Presselite is preparing to release an update to its separate London Tube app, which adds similar AR features to help make the fastest journey to the station of the world's largest and oldest underground tube. It has also been revealed that the new version of the iPhone app Yelp has a hidden Easter egg feature that has a brand new via-camera AR layer. You simply need to shake the phone three times to activate the function, dubbed Monocle. It's demond here: It's quite practical and the links to some killer features of AR mentioned earlier, letting you see Yelp's restaurant and bar (and other businesses) reviews near where you stand are perfect for tourists in a new city. An interesting aspect of these bits of news stands out though: Apple's communications with other official AR app developers like Layar, implied full AR apps won't be approved until the new iPhone firmware is out, complete with AR-friendly code. These first AR apps are already out and working though, having arrived by stealing in the App Store. Apple didn't notice? Are you still working on what to do? Will developers be asked to drag apps until iPhone 3.1 launches? This last idea doesn't seem heavy-handed, and perhaps far-fetched. But Apple's app store management policy has been coming under heavy fire and would not be too in keeping with the company's past sheers. We hope this does not happen and we can enjoy these first AR applications... which represent only the first few flakes of the ar avalanche and we soon expect to comb through the iPhone. [via LondonBussesiPhone, Mashable] If you've ever fantasized about a better transportation system for your city, or maybe if you just want bus services that are more convenient for getting to work, here's a new way to make your feelings known. It is called Transitmix.Developed by fellows in Code for America, Transitmix is an online tool that allows you to develop bus routes throughout the city. Just click on a point and drag the fantasy into place. You can even set your own schedule and see how much it will cost to operate (except labor). This allows anyone to sketch the transit line and see the tradeoffs in service, scheduling, and cost, and then be able to share it with the public, says Tiffany Chu, part of the five-person team that designed the system. Transitmix grew out of a hackathon in January and was inspired by Streetmix, a street design tool developed by 2013 class Code for America fellows. Chu's team wanted to democratize transit planning, but professional designers were also interested in using it. We discovered what we were planning, which was kind of a fun tool, really to fill this gap in the transit planners' workflow, he says. Chu says many departments don't have sophisticated tools for bus control. They rely on a combination of map prints, marker pens, transparent paper, Google Maps (for distance calculations) and Microsoft Excel (cost analysis). It's a very complicated, multi-step, multi-device process that takes a lot of time and isn't very collaborative, he says. Chu's team, which includes Sam Hashemi, Danny Whalen, Dan Getelman and Lyzi Diamond, is now exploring the possibility of the pro version (to complement the open tool) and perhaps an information version that will help cities communicate plans for new routes (or modifications to existing ones). The slideshow's maps were created by fans of particularly enthusiastic transit planning in four cities. Take a look at transmix yourself here. Seattle's skyline is instantly recognizable thanks to the iconic Space Needle, but that doesn't mean that the tourist attraction deserves a place to take the route if you visit the Emerald City. As much as we love good views, watching Seattle from the top of a tower is probably not the best way to actually see it. So we're going to be brave, and we're recommending that you don't put the most symbolical building in town on the seattle entertainment list. By shopping for a world-famous farmers market dining room in the area to haunt or sip craft beer at a local brewery, there are plenty of things to prioritize over taking in view. But if that's the only thing you just need to see, you can also insert a lot of places where you can also take a photo of instagrammable skyline. After all, what's that picture of Seattle that doesn't have a spacet? Be sure to pack the light layers (flannel optional) because we point to the verding Pacific Northwest. Forward, the leader is exploring Seattle as an Emerald City local. Omprakash Das/500px If you visit Seattle's famous Pike Place Market, you will see why the city is known for its beautiful blooms. Florists selling tulips, daffodils, and dália can be found throughout the market, but affordable bouquets are not the only reason to visit this huge indoor farmers market. You will see everything from farmers selling locally grown products to artisans to handcrafted fishmongers tossed freshly caught fish. Wander the market and simply take it all in. If you are working out your appetite, sit at the counter at the Market Grill and order a fish sandwich or head to Lowell for a bowl of chowder (but be sure to ask for a table with waterfront views). If you want to make coffee at the original Starbucks, walk down to 1st and Pike to get your caffeine fixed. Seattle's art life is incredibly accessible. From modern museums to outdoor sculpture gardens, it's easy to find an interesting exhibition does not require an expensive entrance ticket. Whether you want to see historical Indian art or modern installations, Seattle has it all. The Seattle Art Museum, affectionately referred to as SAM by locals, is the perfect place to have a particularly rainy Seattle day. The museum's collection ranges from traditional Native American art to modern works such as Jackson Pollock and Andy Warhol. Notably, the great Instagrammable Yayoi Kusama Infinity Mirrors exhibition is on display through September 10. The Olympic Sculpture Park, an extension of SAM, is a 9-acre park that is free and public. Featuring larger-than-life sculptures, bubbling fountains, and playful facilities, the park is a family-friendly place that art lovers (and even self-proclaimed art haters) will enjoy. The Chihuly Garden and Glass, in a word, is fascinating. Located in the shadow of the Space Needle, the exhibition showcases an incredible glass section by artist Dale Chihuly. Tickets range from $18 to $29, but the entrance price is worth the cost, in our opinion. It would be sloppy not to encourage him to spend some time outdoors. After all, you're in emerald town. What does a trip to Seattle matter without enjoying the vegetation? Capitol Hill Volunteer Park is ideal for a pleasant walk. Grab a coffee at the nearby Volunteer Park Café and walk through the park, which is home to the Volunteer Park Conservatory and the Seattle Asian Art Museum. Be sure to climb to the top of Volunteer Park Water Tower with panoramic views of Capitol Hill. Kerry Park is located in Queen Anne, the perfect place to snap an iconic photo in downtown Seattle. Chances are, that's the view you imagine when you think of Seattle. On a clear day, you can see Mount Rainier beyond the Space Needle and downtown Seattle skyline. Discovery Park is the largest urban park in Seattle. Located on the shores of Puget Sound, the park offers beautiful views of the Olympic mountains and with more than 11 miles of walking trails, it is the perfect outdoor spot for active travellers. When it comes to food, this seaport town is known for its fresh seafood, but Seattle restaurants also reflect the diverse population of the city. Many foodies approved hot spots feature menus that affect Vietnamese, Indian, and Thai flavors, among other things. Ba Bar serves upscale Vietnamese dishes in the city where $5 pho is easy to find. There's usually a crowd waiting for you to sit down, but trust us – it's worth the wait. Order the bò bò Huế if you like the pho spicy. The American side serves Asian-inspired dishes made with fresh seasonal ingredients. The menu is star (and the décor is not so bad either). Be sure to try the crispy duck with fresh rolls and iced coffee creamsicle. We recommend that you reserve to avoid long waits. Bar Melusine Deals instagram-worthy environment (see image below). Owned by the same resting placenats who operate some of Seattle's most beloved restaurants (The Walrus and the Carpenter, The Whale Wins, and Barnacle, to name a few), you can expect a great meal. It is recommended to order a round of oysters and special cocktails to start with. With more than 170 breweries, Seattle is home to more breweries than any other city in the country. From hoppy IPA to smooth stouts to fruity sour, Seattle's best serve pints are almost all kinds of beer you want. Even if you do not consider yourself an artisan beer connarist, it is recommended to find out firsthand what all the fuss is about. Fremont Brewing is a great place to enjoy one of Seattle's notoriously rare sunny days. Push your spot into a shared table at the outdoor Urban Beer Garden and rub elbows with beer-loving Seattleites. You can usually find classic pale ales, coffee porters, and experimental seasonal beer on tap, so there's something for almost every type of beer drinker (plus, it's kid- and dog-friendly). Cloudburst Brewing, a hole-in-the-wall brewery in downtown Seattle known for its delicious, brazenly named beer, where you can find craft beer for the crowd. We recommend ordering a pint of Fresh Saison, made with fresh ingredients, straight from Pike Place Market. Reuben's Brews is one of seattle breweries. The brewery has 24 beers in the Ballard taproom, so we recommend ordering a tasting. If you find something you like, Reuben's has a Crowler machine on site, so it's easy to get home with a 32 ounce of your favorite beer.
