Type: Wireless Accrual accounting method describes the business practice of recording revenues and expenses during the exact time goods are sold or services run, regardless of whether any money changes hands or not. Accrual accounting is the alternative to the cash accounting method, where companies only record revenues and expenses during times when money is actually received or paid. Generally speaking, accrual accounting is used when a company seeks clarity of its performance metrics over a specified period of time, providing a more accurate snapshot of its fiscal activities. Accrual accounting can occur if a company records its revenue in its income statement, covering the period in which goods or services are provided, where a company invoices its customers in credit conditions, but does not pays until later. Similarly, if the company itself buys materials or other supplies in the credit, it records these expenses in its income statement during this period, even if it pays the balance due at any future date. Accrual accounting practices more accurately reflect revenues and expenses over a given period of time, ultimately companies for more accurate gross, operational and profit margin analyses. In the cash accounting method, where revenues and expenses are only recorded if and when money is actually received or paid, companies can get more accurate snapshots of their cash flows. Simply put: If a company invoices its customers on credit terms, it waits until that debt is officially paid before recording that revenue on its balance sheet. For example, if a furniture store sells the customer a leather sofa on credit in February but does not receive payment until April, revenue for this sale will only be recorded in April. This method allows companies with trapped money to know precisely how much money they have at hand, to avoid overgeneration and allow for the most astute budget. The cash flow statement, also called cash flow statement, is the fourth general purpose financial statement and summarizes how changes in balance sheet accounts affect the cash account during the accounting period. It also reconciles the beginning and end of cash account balances and cash equivalents. This statement shows investors and lenders which transactions have affected cash accounts and how a company can use its money effectively and efficiently to finance its operations and expansions. This is particularly important because investors want to know that the company is financially sound, while lenders want to know that the company is net enough to pay its bills as they arrive. In other words, does the company have good cash flow? The term cash flow usually refers to a company's ability to collect and maintain adequate amounts of money to pay its future bills. In other words, a company with good cash flow can collect enough money to pay for its operations and finance its debt service without making late payments. Format and Model The cash flow statement format is divided into three main sections: cash flows from operating activities, investment activities, and financing activities. Operating activities Cash flows from operating activities include transactions in business operations. That is, the operational section represents the money raised from the primary business revenue generation activities, such as sales and service income. Operating activities are short-term and affect only the current period. For example, the payment of supplies is an operational activity because it relates to the company's operations and is expected to be used in the current period. Operating cash flows are calculated by adjusting net income by changes in current accounts of assets and liabilities. Investment activities Os investment activities consist of cash receipts and sales outflows and purchases of long-term assets. In other words, the investment section of the statement represents the money that the company collected from the sale of a long-term asset or the amount of spent on buying a new long-term asset. You can think of this section as the company investing in itself. Investments are long-term and should last more than one accounting period. Investment cash flows are calculated by adding changes in long-term asset accounts. Financing activities Cash flow consists of cash transactions that affect long-term liabilities and equity accounts. In other words, the financing section of the statement represents the amount of money raised from the issuance of shares or loans and the amount of money disbursed to pay dividends and long-term debt. You can think of financing activities as how a company finances its operations, whether through long-term debt or equity financing. Financing cash flows are calculated by adding changes to all long-term accountability and equity accounts. Here's a tip! Here's a tip on how I track what transactions go in each cash flow section. Operating activities: Includes all activities that are reported in the income statement under operating income or expenses. Investment activities: Includes all cash transactions used to buy or sell long-term assets. Think of it as the company investing in itself. Financing activities: Includes all cash transactions that affect long-term liabilities and equity. Whenever long-term debt or equity is involved, it is considered a financing activity. Like all financial statements, the cash flow statement has a security that displays the company name, the claim title, and the reporting time period. For example, an annual income statement issued by Paul's Guitar Shop, Inc. would have the following title: Paul's Guitar Shop, Inc. Cash Flow Statement December 31, 2015 Example Here is the sample cash flow statement of our unadjusted test balance and financial statements used in the accounting cycle examples for Paul's Guitar Shop. How to prepare a Cash Flow Statement Cash flow statement is usually prepared using two different methods: the direct method and the indirect method. Both result in the same financial statement showing how affected financial transactions would have affected the company's bank account. Each method is used for a slightly different reason and typically used for companies of different sizes. Let's take a look at how to create a statement using direct and indirect methods in the next articles. Retained Earnings Statement Balance Sheet
