Nor is it something that usually happens instantly, but usually arises over time. It is important to understand the various signs of genuinely falling in love and whether this chemistry is real. If you're trying to interpret the strong feelings you have for someone, here's how to decipher whether you're in love or if you love them. Meet the expert Theresa E. DiDonato, Ph.D. is a social psychologist and associate professor at Loyola University in Maryland. Read on to find out if you're in love or if you really love them. Determining whether you are truly in love with someone can help you decide whether you should be exclusive to them, stay in a relationship, or make a deeper commitment. Being in love with someone is emotionally charged. If you are wondering what it means to be in love, a key distinction has to do with your emotions. Specifically, when you're in love with someone, you feel a strong, almost inexplicable desire for that person. In fact, being in love means longing for someone: You think of them constantly and long to spend time with them. Loving someone is not based on a whirlwind of emotions. Love grows from a developing attachment. Whether the person you love is a partner, friend, father or child, your strong feelings come from a deeply rooted attachment rather than a high passion and infatuation. Melissa Hobbey, the CMO of dating site OkCupid, has said that quick engagements and whirlwind romances may not work because couples simply don't know each other well enough. Research has shown how people who have come out for at least two years before getting engaged have happier marriages, so there can be no substitute for meeting someone properly. Being in love can disappear over time. When you're in love, deep feelings can be fleeting. It can go from intense worship to indifference as time passes and the person's novelty has worn off. In fact, being in love with someone today is not a guarantee that you will feel the same forever. Christine Meinecke, a clinical psychologist in Des Moines, Iowa, says: Infatuation fades for everyone. That's when you discover your psychological incompatibility, and disenchantment sets in. Suddenly, a switch flips, and now all you can see are their differences. You're focusing on what happens to them. They need to get the message about what they need to change. Loving someone is more permanent. Loving someone is lasting. If the person you love aggravates or disappoints you or grows more distant, you will still always be concerned about that person on some level. In fact, loving another person can be so deeply ingrained the affection you have for an ex can last a long time after a breakup. According to Certified Professional Life Coach and Relationship Expert Kemi Sogunle, We often freely use the word love and mix being in love with someone really loving. Being in love with someone can stem from infatuation, possessivity and obsession. Both speak, hold hands, embrace and develop superficial feelings. You feel lonely when your partner isn't around you. You long and long for them to be with you all the time. Loving someone, on the other hand, goes beyond physical presence. You want to see them grow, you see beyond their flaws, you see opportunities to build each other up and together; motivate, encourage and inspire each other. In other words, when you really love someone, they're both growing up and supporting each other while keeping each other faithful in their relationship. Being in love can easily be shaken. When you are in love with someone, your connection may not be strong enough to make it through challenges without fading away. For example, you may be head over heels for your partner, but as soon as real problems arise, this very passionate connection may disappear. In a few rooms, being in love doesn't mean you really know the other person well enough to overcome obstacles together. Kurt Smith, Psy.D., LMFT, LPCC, AFC, explains, Of course, when a relationship is new, it's fun and nice to court and being tried. At first, we are constantly thinking about the new person in our life, and wanting to spend all our time together and share new experiences. We want to show you how we feel about getting cards or flowers or just sending a cute text message. Feelings, however, can be fleeting. No one seems to want to talk about how these loving feelings can disappear, that it takes work to keep love alive and that choosing to stay in love is a choice we should all make. Loving someone can survive the lows of life. When you love someone, your relationship is strong enough to overcome life's challenges. This is because your bond with others is so inherent that problems can actually bring you closer together. Psychologist Randi Gunther, Ph.D., says: In relationships that harbor the potential for true love, people almost immediately feel the desire to confess and share everything about themselves, whether negative or positive. They just don't want to hold anything back. They feel immediately brave, wanting to meet and be known, no matter what the outcome. After all, love is based on the kind of respect and honesty that develops over time. Meet the expert Randi Gunther, Ph.D., is a clinical psychologist and marriage counselor who practices in California. To understand the difference between being in love and loving someone, it is also important to recognize how these two concepts relate. Being in love with someone actually sets the stage to build long-lasting love. You are willing to make proper sacrifices to meet your partner's needs halfway while enjoying each other's looks that bring out the best in you. You really enjoy your partner's company, so you're motivated to grow together, take risks and make each other's lives easier. A study in the Journal of Social and Personal Relationships found that passion is important, but so is the concern for your partner and your concern for you. People's relationships benefit when the compassion that promotes each other's well-being is given and received by each partner; this will be called compassionate love. Consequently, being in love can become a lifelong commitment. MyDomaine uses only high quality and trusted sources, including expertly reviewed studies, to support the facts within our articles.
