Тематизеские материалы Introduced at Baselworld 2012, the Hamilton Intra-matic was the follow-up to the Thin-O-matic and it took the vintage inspired trend a step further, towards what I would call modern vintage. Apart from the movement and the flush mounted crystal, one could almost believe that the Intra-matic was NOS (new old stock), found in your grandfather's tray, minty and forgotten for over fifty years. The trend towards watches that pay homage to the brand's legacy models is one that has seen the watch world many times and to varying degrees of success. The Hamilton Intra-matic is an interesting example of this trend in that the aesthetic of the watch is pure vintage 60's, but the aesthetic is not used exclusively for irony and nostalgia. Although I agree that the Intra-matic is a very nostalgic timepiece, it is also one with practical and modern elements that translate well to today's wrists. The Intra-matic comes in two sizes, a 38mm version that is featured in this review, and a 42mm version. I had originally asked for the 42mm for review as I rarely wear watches smaller than 40mm. Although I didn't know it yet, it was a happy thing that no 42mm samples could be sourced for review. A 38mm was sent instead, and I found this size to be excellent. Given the minimal bezel, extended dial and extra-long baton markings, the Intra-matic wears out much larger than the case measurement suggests. I can only assume that the 42mm version would feel closer to 45mm on the wrist. See the included video showing a side-by-side size comparison with a 41.5mm Omega Seamaster. This 38mm dress watch is 10mm thick with a lug to lug length of just 44mm. These proportions, along with the 50g weight (on the included leather strap) make the Intra-matic a very comfortable and exceptionally wrist-friendly option for those with smaller or thinner wrists. If you have a large wrist or prefer the presence of a larger watch, stop by a Hamilton retailer and try both on for size, you'll be surprised by whichever model you prefer. With a very minimal polished steel case, much of the Intra-matic's character comes from its simple yet elegant facet lugs and its vast sunbeam dial. Although I think this is the best version, there is also the option of a black dial or even a model with a gold casing. The dial carries no digits, with long and readable baton markers that are part of the only scale present in the design. Electoral text is right on the line of intrusive and one would that Hamilton does not have to take both automatic and intra-matic on the Dial. Most prominent in the dial design are either the large and vintage inspired Hamilton H logo, or the date window that is integrated at six o'clock. The Intra-matic doesn't have a second hand, something I would really miss if I started using this as a daily carrier. The hour and minute hands are done in a stick style that fits nicely with the hour markers. The end result is a beautiful watch with a simple yet elegant design that pays homage to Hamilton's American roots. Powering the Intra-matic is the ETA 2892-2, a reliable and highly capable timekeeper that is often seen in watches costing much more than this Hamilton. Visible through the display case back, the 2892-2 is beautiful, but not ornate, decorated. Given the lack of a second hand, I can't accurately state the timekeeping ability of my assessment unit. With an autographed Hamilton rotor, the 2892 is a 21 jewel automatic that was notably used in many Omega models like the cal 1120 and as the basis of the early versions of Omega's coaxial motion, the cal 2500. It's pretty unusual to see this movement in a watch costing less than $1000. It is in this combination of a practical but elegant vintage design combined with a very reliable movement that the Intra-matic finds so charming. The time display is very readable and thanks to the black on silver minimal design, can be read in very low light, despite the fact that there are no luminous dial elements. I'm torn by the lack of a second hand. On most watches, it might be a deal breaker, but it seems to make sense on the Intra-matic, especially if you're planning on using a watch like this not as your daily wearer, but as your go-to dress watch. Ultimately, the importance of a second display is yours, and Hamilton offers other clothing watches in the Jazzmaster and Timeless Classic ranges that are slim, elegant and use a second view. Hamilton's list price on the 38mm Intra-matic is $870, with the 42mm costing a bit more at $945 USD. The exact model seen here is the H38455751 and you can see the entire range here. That's an excellent price and I think the Intra-matic will compete not only against options from Christopher Ward and Tissot, but also against Hamilton's own Jazzmaster and Thin-O-Matic ranges. Where the Intra-matic differs from much of the competition is its size and its purely vintage design. If you've always wanted a vintage watch but didn't want the hassle of maintenance and possibly sourcing parts for a 40+ year old watch, the Intra-matic is a great alternative. The look is about as chic or casual as you want it to be, not looking too wrong with jeans and probably right away at home with a suit. Anyway, the Hamilton acts as a callback to a time many of us have idealized as being in some way classier, sexier, or perhaps smoky. The Intra-matic gives you a taste of it 60's Don Draper-ism without the cancer, liver failure, and broken marriages so many of us conveniently forget. It's all of the charm with none of the cost, unlike that fedora you're still trying to pull off. Necessary Data >Brand: Hamilton >Model: Intra-matic (H38455751) >Price: $870 USD >Size: 38 x 10mm (44mm lug to lug) >Weight: 50g >Heavy reviewer personal wear: Yes >Girlfriend we recommend first: Someone looking for a chic alternative to their daily sports watch, or the biggest fan of Mad Men you know. >Worst feature of watch: No seconds to display >Ste feature of the watch: Vintage appeal without the headache of vintage property Hodinkee 2020 feels more like a tool watch year. That being said, here's a cool new dress watch: Hamilton teamed up with watch lovers at Hodinkee on a special, vintage-inspired version of their Intra-Matic. 38mm wide, it features a nice champagne-colored dial, date wheel at 6 o'clock, thin, stick hour and minute hands and indexes and, well, that's it - not a second hand. As it should be for an elegant watch. Hodinkee At $845, the 10mm-thick Intra-Matic is packed with value: it features the tried and tested, Swiss ETA 2892A2 automatic movement with 42 hours power reserve, a domed sapphire crystal, and a design (and lug width) that works well with countless belts. (The watch ships on a brown leather strap, unadorned with any stitching and apparently very smooth and comfortable, according to our friends in Hodinkee.) Hamilton's midcentury logo ties the whole package together - if the watch were wound manually and a little smaller, you'd just be wrong for something released in the 1960s.
