In the 1960s, some African-Americans began to give their children names from African cultures. Some adults also changed their names to African or Muslim names. Because slaves were often assigned the surnames of their owners and given common first names, choosing African names is a way for African-Americans to recognize their heritage before slavery. However, only a few real African names, such as Ayana, Kwame, and Jabari, have become widely popular in the African-American community. Muslim names in the Arabic language, such as Isha, Jamal, Malik and Aaliyah, have been more popular lately, even among African-Americans who have not adopted the Islamic religion. Since the 1970s, it has become more common African Americans to create new names for their children by combining their own set of fashionable sounds and syllables. Names for girls formed in this way are called Lakeisha names after one of the most important examples. Lakeisha names are created by pairing a fashionable prefix, such as Sha-, La-, Ka-, Shan-, or Ty-, or Ty-, with a fashionable suffix, such as -isha, -ika, -onda, -ae, -ique, -ique, ice cream. The resulting names are almost always accentuated on the second syllable. In the 1970s and 1980s, names starting with L.A., such as Lashonda and Lashay, were the most popular. In the 1990s, Sha names like Shameka, Shanae and Shaniqua were in vogue. In 2004, names starting with Yes or ending in -iyah such as Jakayla, Jamiya, Janiyah, and Taniyah were in vogue. But the point of this habit for most parents is to create a unique name for their child, and many are successful. Even in states as large as Pennsylvania, every year the average African-American girl receives a name that no other African-American girl is given in that state. It was not possible to include many of these unique names, such as Azanae, Kyaire and Zatteria, but they are now the most typical kind of names for African-American girls. Names for guys that are made the same way are DeJuan, Deonte, Jamarion, Ladarius, and Quantavious. The Masai Mara National Reserve in Kenya has each of the big cats, as well as large wildebeest migrations. For a look at a variety of African animals, Kruger National Park in South Africa has self-drive safaris.
