Each of these elements already belongs to one of two categories: block-level elements or inline elements. Understanding the difference between these two types of elements is an important step in building websites. What is a block-level element? A block-level element is an HTML element in the parent element. It creates large sections of content, such as paragraphs or page divisions. In fact, most HTML elements are block-level elements are used inside the body of an HTML document. They can contain inline elements as well as other block-level elements. Unlike a block-level element, an inline element: It can start inside a row. It's not starting a new line. Its width extends only as far as its tags determine. An example of an inline element is alt; strong>, which makes the font in text content bold. The Inline element usually contains only other inline elements, or it can't contain anything like < br> break tag. HTML also has a third element type: those that are not displayed when they are rendered in a Web browser. For example: <style>text, but keep html header values. When h1-h6 values change to text, text that appears after its close tag can still flow next to it in the same row instead of starting with a new line. Remove an element: If you want to completely remove an element from the normal flow of a document, you can set the displayed to none One note, be careful when using the screen: none. While this style certainly makes the element invisible, you never want to use this to hide text that you've added for SEO. One of the most common mistakes that a newcomer to Web design makes is trying to set the width for the inline element. This does not work because the container box has not specified intline element width. Texted elements override multiple features: width and maximum height width, and maximum height width, and maximum height width and min height bicrosoft Internet Explorer (replaced with Microsoft Web browser. To specify the width or height of an element, you want to apply
