Bel Air's fresh prince theme song gives viewers the show's default breakdown. A teenage boy named Will from West Philadelphia was getting into trouble at home: to help fix this, his mother sent him to live with his uncle, aunt and cousins across the country in Bel Air, Los Angeles. The fresh Prince of Bel Air, at its core, is an upcoming story of an age in which Will (smith's character is easily named) learns many life lessons. There's a lot of laughter along the way, of course. But the show was unique because of portraying many of the struggles faced by young black men like Will. Yo Home to Bel-Air is a world-recognizable theme song of Fresh Prince. DJ Jazzy Jeff and Fresh Prince (smith's stage name) worked with Quincy Jones to write and create the piste. Like Smith's character in Song and Sitcom, Smith was born and grew up in West Philadelphia. A receptionist at Ambridge District High School near Pittsburgh contacted a student to remind him of an appointment and was horrified when he was sent to audio, the Washington Post reported. Student Randet recorded himself from the theme song Fresh Prince as his voicemail. The receptionist heard by mistake as he said he was shooting some b-ball outside the school as some people were shooting outside He called police and schools in Beaver County, Pennsylvania, were locked up while looking for students. It turned out to have been in his guidance counselor's office the whole time. Police placed him under arrest and, after listening closely to his voicemail, found that he was actually raping about the b-ball shooting. Superstar Will Smith now wants to reboot in the process, so we might be taking a trip to Bel Air earlier as we thought. The Hollywood Reporter confirms that Smith has signed on to the executive producing a remake of his hit show Fresh Princess Bel Air. The project, which is currently being bought into multiple networks, will be based on a viral trailer created by writer and director (and fresh Prince super fan) Morgan Cooper in 2019 that re-imagines the NBC comedy series as a drama titled Bel Air.While the original series follows eponymous character Smith on his corruption-filled journey to becoming the newly prince of Bel Air, the show is developing dark turns. In Bel Air, whose infamous scuffle mentioned in the theme song actually lands Will behind bars - police discover that he illegally carried a weapon with him and detained him - and his mother quickly feryyed him to the Banks family in Los Angeles to prevent him from serving a prison sentence. Far from the community he knows and loves, Will initially struggles to adjust to his new environment, but the love of his family and friends helps him find his place and his throne. What's exciting to me is the new media of all of it, Smith told Cooper in a reaction video shared on his YouTube channel. Even for you to create a land video is keeping up with the idea of how the idea [for the fresh prince] originally came to me. The pair will team up for Bel Air and will be joined by some members of the OG Show team. THR reports that original series producers Quincy Jones and Benny Medina, as well as creators Andy & Susan Borowitz, will work alongside Smith as exec producers. Cooper will write the script with Chris Collins (Wire, Coincidence, Sons of Anarchy), who will also serve as its show runner. Bel Air is still in its development phase, so there's no whisper about who could possibly take on Smith's star-making role in the reboot, but knowing that the prince himself is new to the ride with reconstruction I'm at ease - there's no way it won't be good. Show action buttons some sitcom theme songs really stick with you, so they become iconic pieces of pop culture on and from themselves. This is certainly true of the theme song The Fresh Prince of Bel Air, which rewrites the story of how Will Smith's character was sent to go live with his aunt and uncle in one of Los Angeles' most boogie neighborhoods. To date, 30 years on from the show for the first time, many of us still know every last word to that tune and can totally picture Smith's character in awe as his taxi pulled up to his new home in Bel Air. Our last attachment to the story weaving by the theme song Fresh Prince makes the realization that the mansion depicted in the show is actually located in a very wild Bel Air. Like most sitcoms of that era, scenes that took place inside uncle Phil and Aunt Viv's house were shot on the sound stage. However, creating photos for those scenes featured the Great White House with soaring columns, surely you remember . The house where the photos starred is on Bristol Street in the Brentwood neighborhood of Los Angeles, IMDB reported. While you might think that it's a strange choice to suggest that inherently linked to a particular neighborhood, Brentwood is only about five miles from Bel Air. Houses in these two regions also fall within the same price range as high prices. So, although the Bristol Street house is not actually in the namesake neighborhood of the show, it's impressive value that lives up to the fantasy Bel Air lifestyle that is the key to sitcom. Realtor.com prince's house today is estimated at $6,475,500. And, at 6,438 square feet, with five bedrooms and five bathrooms, it's also enough space for the entire banks family including his nephew - well, at least until Nikki was born towards the end of Season 3. So although, the Banks Mansion in Bel Air is not it still reflects the story laid out in the show and its popular enduring theme song. Tracks.
