The lever is attached to the spring loaded paws (8) a curved gripper placed on top of the bullet belt. When the cam and lever move, the pawn moves away, grabs onto the ink tank and pulls the belt through the gun. When the bolt moves forward, it pushes the next cartridge into the room. The feed system drives the bullet belt through the ink tank guide (2) above the breeze, while the bolt sliding forward on top of it pushes the next cartridge in line. This drives the ink tank out of the belt with the room ramp(3) the room ramp forces the ink tank down the front of the bolt, the bolt has a small extraction machine, which holds the base of the ink tank shell when the ink tank moves in place. When the cartridge moves in front of the bolt, it ejects the spring (6) when the shot pin hits the primer, propelling the bullet into the tank, the explosive force drives the operation lever and the bolt is stuck backwards. When the shell clears the wall, the spring ejects forward, pokes the shell out of the gun through the ejected port. This system allows you to shoot continuously without reloading. This content is not compatible on this device. Click and hold the trigger to see how the load and eject system works. The basic mechanism of machine guns has remained the same for more than a hundred years. But gun manufacturers are constantly adding new modifications. One modern design switches from box to gun with a single button [Source: Sofge] In addition, the new lightweight small arms technology (LSAT) is made of lightweight materials that can reduce the weight of machine guns and their ammunition. Whether you've ever held a machine gun or seen this powerful device have a profound effect on your life.
