Montana moss ahath Moss ahat is a semi-precious gem formed from silica. This is a form of halcedone, which includes minerals of green color embedded in the stone, forming strands and other patterns suggesting moss. [1] The field is clear or milky white quartz, and the minerals included are mainly manganese or iron oxides. This is not a real form of ahat, because there are no concentric stripes. [2] Moss ahat can be clear or milky white, with green dendritic inclusions that look like moss. Colours are formed due to traces of metal present as impurities, such as chromium or iron. Metals can make different colors depending on their valence (degree of oxidation). [3] Despite its name, ahat moss does not contain organic matter and is usually formed by vesic volcanic rocks. It is found in India, Brazil, Uruguay, formed in the Yellowstone National Park area of Wyoming as a result of volcanic activity. In Montana, moss ahat the red color is the result of manganese oxide, and the black color is the result of manganese oxide. The gem is also known as mocha stone after the Arab city of Mocha in Yemen, once a source. [2] Gothic-style bracelet; gold, carneol, malachite, moss aate, amethysts, aquamarines, rubies.
