The most welcoming, responsive and obedient local shepherd dogs in Germany were bred to create what is now known as a German Shepherd dog. This breed was responsible for protecting sheep herds and herds against predators. They were not considered pets or companions, but farmers. Their intellect, speed, strength and fervent sense of smell made them the perfect choice as shepherders. Although German shepherds were considered strict workers, not then household pets, farmers had to provide food, protection and shelter for the breed. Until the beginning of the First World War, the German Shepherd dog was popular throughout Germany and quickly spread to other parts of the world. People loved the German Shepherd for their loyal and courageous character. Due to the breed's reputation for being brave and easy to train, German Shepherds were admitted as police dogs and sight dogs for the blind. Their superb sense of smell and daring character made the German Shepherd the perfect police dog. Their faithful observance of what is happening around them, along with their patience, landed them the role of leader blind. These outstanding qualities and qualities make the German Shepherd a wonderful home companion, protector and friend. The breed is reserved by strangers at first, but warms up quickly. This characteristic makes them great guarding theuses, especially for children. It's good to socialize them when they are young, and take them on long walks or go all their lives.
