This is both it is the greatest strength and biggest problem when I worked there. First the positive - Reddit really took care of its product, it's customers, and it's impact. CEO and other C-Suite were active in weekly all-hands meetings and were open to progress, failure, opportunity. They made a bona fide effort to engage the team with THE quality assurance and to try to tackle both difficult and frivolous problems directly. This was facilitated by the fact that the company was as small as it was, but the best thing about working on Reddit is that you can tell the people who are there said they gave a d*mn. Even though there were so many challenges, there was also so much room to grow and improve. The flip side of this coin was that (when I was there) Reddit struggled to be a well-organized, professional company - things were constantly changing, sales and burnout at all levels, and the experience of people on Reddit was either pretty good/ok good/ok or absolutely horrible. 95% of this depended on your manager, manager, and team. Some teams had it absolutely together. They had the talent, tools and support they needed to do their best work. Other teams were in absolute rubble and spent more time procuring the talent, building the tools, and trying to find the support they needed than actually doing their job, through no fault of their own. At the end of the day, this seems to be pretty standard for start-ups trying to lay the groundwork as they move forward and get on top. For this reason, it can be completely hit or missed, depending on your personal experience there.
