On April 27, 1945, three days before Adolf Hitler quit his life on his own, U.S. forces discovered the Cowpering Lager IV concentration camp in southern Germany. As, which was approached by the camp's liberators, and the barracks were torched by Nazi officers, killing scores of inmates who were too malnourished to escape the flames. Covered with skeletons. 16 years ago, the World War II miniseries Band of Brothers brought the horrors of Cowpering Lager IV to the small screen, with heart-wrenching and unforgettable television productions. Band of Brothers is very close to the document and successfully depicts historical simulations for the audience. Professor Marcus Stiglegger, an alien and hell scene, we found something, we were out on patrol when we came across this... At this point, American soldier Frank Perconte is literally lost for words. Commander Dick Winters, played by Damian Lewis, pushes him for answers. But Perconte can't understand what he saw, and he can never explain it. I don't care. Winter soon sees Perconte. Beethoven's string quartet Number 14 swells to the score as Winter and his men face a frail and miserable prisoner. One harbors the body of a dead relative. Another man tears up after kissing the liberated ones' cheeks. The scene culminates in a conversation between translator Joseph Rebekah and the prisoner. When asked why they had been imprisoned, the prisoner replied, "Whether it is a state, a yuden, a state. The ensemble cast, including Tom Hardy (pictured), put on a believable performance as dumb soldiers (pictured: HBO) Can be touched by the horrors of Rebekah, Winters and fellow officers as they investigate the scene in front of them. The ensemble cast, which has already put on an intense performance in previous episodes, is surprisingly believable as foolish soldiers face such incredible human suffering. Marcus Stiglegger, professor of film at DEKRA Hochschule Berlin, says that as audiences we experience this through their eyes. This scene gives you a presentation where you can imagine something that's hard to portray on screen. The setting of the long side to stay faithful to the documented image is of course moody. The sky is cloudy and the camp chapter is a combination of mud, ash and human remains. It's hard to believe that Sophie's Choice (pictured: HBO) inspired by the concentration camp was taken in Hertfordshire. An Atfield (pictured: HBO) Stigler explains that the scene is accurate in its depiction of the camp, which resembles the perspective of the film team that documented the aftermath of the liberation. The entire mise-en-scène attempts to link to a documented image. Muddy squares, dry bodies, empty gazes, corpses. This is combined with recent camera handling modes, such as shaky handheld styles, and color grading based on earth tones. Band of Brothers remains very close to the documentation and how it was shot and successfully depicts historical simulations for the audience. According to Stiglegger, it uses a shaky camera (also known as a kesh cam) and dark color greying. Inspired by the 1982 film Sophie's Choice, Nixon was disillusioned with the war when he reached the hellish concentration camp (pictured: HBO) The reason we fight itself is "Why We Fight", which was drawn from the American propaganda film series released between 1942 and 1945. In, and eight episodes leading up to 1945. In The Men of the Easy Company came through hell. They braved the D-Day landings, the Siege of Bastogne, and the freezing conditions of the Ardennes Forest. The question on the lips of many war-weary soldiers is, "Why are we fighting?" The episode focuses primarily on Officer Lewis Nixon, played by actor Ron Livingston, who is being disillusioned by the war that ruined his marriage, and sees the death of his comrades and push him into alcoholism. Nixon is most disillusioned with the scene leading to the liberation of the camp. He recalls the recent deaths of his fellow paratroopers, bloody, gory, and a helluva way to die! I'm singing. "Why you fight" answers (photo: HBO) But at the end of the liberation, he faces a man in a concentration camp uniform and holding his body. The U.S. military was not prepared for what was waiting for them, Stiglegger says. Rumors spread about these camps in the military. But to face the real hell... It's another dimension. In this one scene, both Nixon and the audience give their answers. This is why they fight. More from i: Why the British Holocaust Memorial should be tucked next to Parliament despite opposition from lawmakers I had to make music about the horrors of Holocaust Bella Guttmann: the manager who survived the Holocaust, conquered Europe and one of my favorite episodes of the brothers' master HBO miniseries Band of Brothers episode 9, Why We Fight. It features members of an easy company taking place at one of the Dharau satellite camps in Bavaria. On April 4, 1945, ve-day began the discovery and liberation of the Odrup concentration camp, where tens of thousands of U.S. troops faced the true horrors of the Nazi regime and its vision of a thousand-year empire. Episode 9 depicts this surprise and disbelief in an emotionally horrific way. Frank Perconte and James Madio. Courtesy of James. I interviewed actor James Madio, who portrayed one of the originals. Member of easy company, Sgt. Frank Perconte. As well as being a great actor, James has been an important part of the educational travel programme Easy Company: From the UK to Eagles Nest from 2017. I had the pleasure of doing a tour with him in 2017, including a visit to Dachau Kfourcamp near Landsburg am Lech. Not only did he take note in the series, but he also became a great man and close friend. Our conversation is below. James Madio and a reenactment at Normandy 2017. Courtesy of Jeremy Collins. What did you know about the Holocaust before you were edited by Frank Perconte? I didn't know as much about the Holocaust as I should. When I was a child, sadly I didn't put much effort into education, and it's something I sincerely regret not knowing enough about the Holocaust. We are very grateful for the amazing opportunity offered by Band of Brothers. And a hard introduction to better understand the Holocaust is certainly one of them. James Madio at the American Cemetery in Normandy in 2018. Courtesy of James Madio, what did you prepare to film episode 9, Why Are We Fighting? When I first read episode 9, Why Are We Fighting, my first reaction was, is Frank Perconte really a guy from Easy Company? So I immediately called him and asked if this was true. After talking to Frank, he went back to headquarters and said he wasn't the one to mark the camp's main winter. At that particular movie moment, I think the production had a creative license. Most of my actual preparations were to better understand Frank's constant feelings; Fight for two years, stay away from home, hang in camp, and have a relationship with Private O'Keefe - replacing him with a tail throughout the episode. I avoided a lot for that episode, and I was incredibly honored that producers and writers heavily featured Frank in certain episodes. It meant a lot to Frank's friends and family. Did Frank have anything to say about it? You know, there were some questions that I never really asked Frank, and one of them was about the Holocaust. I always stepped lightly with some question to Frank. I didn't want to provoke his feelings. His friendship was very important to me, and I never wanted to defile it. So, unless he talks about a particular difficult topic, I've never asked. I wish I had more information and a better answer for you, but that's the truth. A scene from episode 9. Courtesy of James Madio. Explain the shooting. Was there something else about filming that scene/episode? Filming Episode 9 was vastly different from previous episodes of Why We Fight. There were no gun guns, squid and assault rehearsals in this episode. So the rehearsals and settings were completely different. Intentionally, the production team had already dressed the set. Concentration camp means actors, acting, props and more... When most of our actors arrived, everything was in place. So, you can imagine our reaction, we had never seen anything like it. The set itself was really hard to spend time with. The size of that event and the importance of that particular episode really sank. I will frequently tell fans of the show: take us to the actual camp on our first visit. What were the similarities or differences between history and Hollywood? My first visit to any camp was a few years later, after a band of brothers. We visited one of the Dharau subcamps at the end of the tour. At Band of Brothers, we had the best performance during the production. amazing production team. So, the external elements had many similarities, shapes and ideas of all. Even for me, internally, there were no similarities to visiting the actual place. Just as filming was realistic at times, it was a movie set. The moment I walked into the camp or got closer to the place for that matter, it was an immediate feeling of confusion, anger, and disbelief. the whole of everything, the conditions, the amount of pain and death; The separation between Hollywood and reality could not be more pronounced. A word with guests at the Dahu satellite camp in Germany in 2017. Courtesy of Jeremy Collins. You've done it many times again now, how do guests help you better understand this camp, liberation, and human experience? In the most modest way, banded in with guests on this epic trip for two weeks at this point of the tour, it is my instinct to help them understand the camp for themselves. It does a lot of soul searching and new emotions that most people never felt. We all deal with grief and death in different ways. As for the human experience, it's important to hold hands, answer questions, or hug someone while visiting a camp - a way for any of us to lend ourselves on that day. The document is part of an ongoing series marking the 75th anniversary of the end of World War II made possible by U.S. banks. Jeremy Collins joined the National World War II Museum in 2001 as an intern and now oversees the agency's public programming initiatives. Learn more about the standoff on the Gustav line in January 1944. As leader of Ainsatzgruppe D, Otto Olendorf was responsible for the killings of 90,000 Soviet Jews, Roma and communists. On January 3, 1946, William Lord Hoho Joyce, an avid fascist and Nazi propaganda broadcaster, was executed after being convicted of treason. By In the winter of 1945, millions of U.S. troops were on the move, but they were not alone. During World War II, 60,000 women married by American soldiers left their old homes behind and hoped to re-join with their husbands for a new life in the United States. But the limited U.S. immigration policy for these war brides has raised major challenges. Miracle, a Christmas classic on 34th Street, provides a surprisingly realistic perspective on World War II refugees. On December 21, 1945, Gen. George S. Patton, one of the top U.S. battlefield commanders, died at an army hospital in Heidelberg, Germany. General Charles Chuck Jaeger was best known as the first person to break the sound barrier, but during World War II Jaeger was a decorated fighter ace. The score for the popular song, purchased in 1943, is a lifelong link from a young girl with tech boss Neal K. Moore. Moore.
