March 31, 2017 6 min read opinions of entrepreneurs contributors are their own. Joining a book club and reading frequently can have a big impact on your success as an entrepreneur. Online book clubs help you cope with the stress of daily life and can polish certain skills you need to succeed. Entrepreneurs usually consider reading as a hobby, so they tend to put it on the back burner and forget it altogether. However, reading itself can help improve communication skills, reduce stress, improve mental agility, and improve focus and concentration. Most entrepreneurs read books about their industry, but it is important to read widely. Novels, poems, short stories and biographies stimulate your brain so you can easily understand different opinions and perspectives. Online book clubs promote reading through social interaction with people on the same wavelength. Book clubs connect you with peers who have the same interests. Do you pay too much for company insurance? Do you have critical gaps in your coverage? Trust entrepreneurs to help you find out. Imagine being in the office with one minute and 15 seconds a day. Then imagine pushing one of your colleagues and punching another in the face. What would your boss say? What would management do? I would probably be fired if not arrested. But I work for a magazine, not a basketball team. The first rule of the NBA is that you don't talk about the NBA. In 2004, Indiana striker Ron Artest jumped into the stands and attacked a spectator who he thought was throwing a drink at him. Last season, Bruce Bowen of San Antonio shot Seattle's Ray Allen in the back. On Saturday, Denver forward Carmelo pushed Anthony Tonate Robinson and beat Mardy Collins During a tense game with the New York Knicks. For history buffs, this may seem like a return to the '77-'78 season, when Kareem Abdul-Jabbar punched Milwaukee's Kent Benson in the face and a few months later Los Angeles striker Kermit Washington dealt Rudy Tomjanovich a near-fatal blow. For a purist, this must seem embarrassing for basketball. It's not boxing. It's not wrestling. It's not even hockey. And there is no place Violence on a basketball court. For a businessman, however, this must seem absurd. At some level, NBA teams are companies like everyone else. At some level, they are simply trying to make a profit. (The Boston Celtics used to be a publicly traded company.) And at some level, the players are employees, the management is responsible, and everyone has to start behaving as if they were part of a professional organization. The only one who seems to understand this is NBA Commissioner, David Stern, who imposed suspensions on seven players and fined each team a fine of 500,000 dollars. But even his sentences seem mild compared to what would have happened if the incident had occurred in a different environment. The longest ban was 15 games and no fines were levied on the coaches. (The dispute was sparked by a hard foul that may have been ordered by New York coach Isiah Thomas.) Violence in the workplace is not tolerated, so why is it tolerated on a basketball court? Book clubs don't run themselves! Successful groups choose good books, have interesting discussions and cultivate community. If you're setting up a book club yourself, you might need some ideas to create a fun group that people keep coming back to. Glow Decor / Getty Images Choosing a book can be difficult. There are countless great stories to discover, and having members with different tastes can make it even harder to choose a book. One way is to create a theme for your club. If you have more focus, limit the books you can choose from. Will your group focus on biographies, mystery thrillers, science fiction, graphic novels, literary classics or any other genre? If you find that restricting your club to a genre is too stifled, you can change the genre from month to month or from year to year. In this way, your club can still be open to a mix of genres while choosing books so much easier for you. Another method is to select 3 to 5 books and put them to the vote. In this way, everyone will have a say in what they will read. Jules Frazier Photography / Getty Images It may be a good idea to decide what kind of book club you want to develop in terms of the social level. In other words, will meetings be a place to talk about topics other than the book itself? Or will your book club be more focused? If they know what to expect, it will attract members who enjoy this atmosphere and come back. It won't be fun for anyone, to find a conversation in order to find yourself in an academically stimulating environment, or vice versa. EmirMemedovski / Getty Images It is important to consider how often your book club meets and for how long. When deciding when you want to meet, make sure that members have enough time to read the part of the book that is being discussed. Depending on whether a chapter, section, or the entire book is discussed, the weekly, monthly or every 6 weeks. When it comes to finding a time that works for everyone, it's easier to plan if there aren't too many people. With 6 to 15 people are usually a good size for book clubs. How long the meeting should last is an hour's starting point. If the conversation exceeds an hour, great! But make sure you limit the session to a maximum of two hours. After two hours, people get tired or bored, which is not the note you want to finish. Aaron McCoy / Getty Images Preparing for a book club meeting, here are some questions you should consider: Who will host? Who should bring refreshments? Who will lead the discussion? By taking these questions into account, you can keep the stress away from each member. EmirMemedovski / Getty Images Here are some tips for getting started with the conversation. The discussion leader could ask the group one question at a time. Or have a handout with up to five questions that everyone will keep an eye on throughout the discussion. Alternatively, the discussion leader could write down another question on multiple cards and give each member a card. This member will be the first to address this issue before opening up the discussion to everyone else. Make sure that a person does not dominate the conversation. When this happens, phrases like Let's hear from some others or help with a time limit. YinYang / Getty Images If you are a member of a book club, share your ideas. You can also read stories from other book clubs. Book clubs are about community, so sharing and receiving ideas and recommendations is a great way to make your group thrive. Thrive.
