Hope you like the products that we recommend! They have all been independently selected by our editors. Just so you know, BuzzFeed may collect a share of sales or other compensation from the links on this page if you decide to shop from them. Oh, and for your information - accurate prices and items in stock as of the time of publication. BuzzFeed emerged from the depths of web culture and began its life as a place to find delicious things online. Blast Katie Holderness' post about the dress (white and gold, by the way) is a reminder that while we are now doing a lot more things, we haven't moved away from our roots. In fact, we launched a cute app or not yesterday. What happened instead is that the world has moved towards us. What could have been, a few years ago, the phenomenon of web culture was today a cultural phenomenon, and the distinction between the two is not really clear. Last night, we spoke to each other on Twitter and also handed over phones in bars and bedrooms. Mindy Kaling's book fought about it, Kim and Kanye disagreed, and Taylor Swift was brilliantly confused. The president (Estonia) also weighed and we covered it as a web phenomenon and a piece of cloth in the world. The first Cates shared the same picture, and as the news became known, Claudia Koerner in Los Angeles and Ryan Broderick in London got the story behind it; Some of the muscles we used to cover the overall clothes, were the ones we had for years. Others, such as strict scientific writing, were very new. Already, we have many new muscles in BuzzFeed. BuzzFeed News is sent today by Mike Giglio in Kirkuk, Iraq; Shira Frankel in Jerusalem; Carla Zlodovsky in Durango, Mexico; These, too, are part of the culture and conversation that live on the Internet, and they benefit from the roots, distribution and tools that have grown with us out of the internet. They also share with Cates' last thing more abstract about how we think about content: we are more interested than anything in what the story does - not only in the number of people you read, but in what it affects their lives and on the world. Katz's participation has delighted people and connected them. To steal an idea from Frank's costume, its power was less in the coated element itself than in the surrounding grid. That's right from a wonderful piece of entertainment. It's true of a DIY recipe or suggestion. and that's true from a news article that forces from an official who claims to be corrupt or change government policy. Finally, I'm very happy that Katz is the new wearer of buzzfeed's golden crown (which, in fact, made Kay Towell her this morning). Cates preceded me a little bit at BuzzFeed and started here as a community user who loved animals and loved the internet. It embodies an essential element in the spirit we have always had: it lives on the Internet and loves the Internet without any irony or any particular illusion about it. So thank you, Katz, for following a hint from buzzFeed Tumblr follower to dress up. Thanks also to our technology team for keeping the site up - Cates' post alone has had over 28 million views so far, 79% of mobile and 94% of social sources - so I could spend the last night arguing with my kids about the dress. Thank you, of course, for many writers who were late and early in intelligent and creative angles (some of which we adapted to Spanish, French, Portuguese and German) - among them, Katie Nottopoulos, the destroyer of white and imaginary horses. Jenny explores how autistic people see themselves at the moment. Daniel Dalton is in a strange and wonderful relationship and we may earn a commission from the links on this page, but we only recommend the products we recover. Why do you trust us? Wikihow.com offers both 9- and 16 step chart for how to be a stylish girl. People.com, a celebrity's favorite comet site of mine (the latest for a slide show of Kate Middleton's maternal look), yields nearly a thousand results describing women as classy. But here is the neat thing all ladies should know: you just can't add a neat touch to the crop top. Using this c word is déclassé like paper cups in a wedding black tie. Class is like money: it's both secret and clear. For those who own either, it is unrealistic to discuss a trust fund, a triple legacy at Yale, or an imminent appointment at the family ambassadorial level. It is also unwise to draw attention to the same indicators in another person. Admire Giacometti or Richter on the shelf, but do not complement the lavish taste of the owner. If the hostess wears a custom Chanel, you can say she looks beautiful, but for heaven's sake don't ask where she picked it up. Among those who advocate refinement, describing the person - almost always a woman - also distinguish the nifty speaker as a person without understanding the accuracy of the privilege. Those who use the word neat without ridicule are not. Instead of relying on the term to describe all things well and how well, use your words. Those elegant women prefer to be called usually elegant, say elegant when we simply mean good. So let's just call a shovel shovel: a good meal, a beautiful dress, an incredible house. Classic is fine too, because it means traditional or beautiful - but not high class. Ladies, real housewives from New York will tell you (over and over again) that money can't buy you class. But you can buy a primer in etiquette. This content is created and maintained by a third party, and is imported to this page to help users provide their email addresses.
