With just a few minutes to go before a big meeting in a remote office, participants are frantically looking for a long HDMI cable that is supposed to be connected to the large flat-screen TV conference room. They need it so they can hook up the laptop to show the presentation, they will tell the pilot fish to be on the phone back at the head office. Fish knows the remote location well enough to be able to guide users to various IT stashes where they can find a replacement. When it doesn't pan out, the fish gets them to cannibalize another setup of its HDMI cable. It's shorter, but they can make it work by having a driver stand next to the TV with a laptop. They are relaxed, because now everyone in attendance will be able to see the presentation. And, aside from the fish, one adds, including those that connect from head office, right? No, it won't work, I'm telling them. Why? Do they also need an HDMI cable? No, it's not cable, the fish sighs. It's never been cable. Fish then quickly walks them up, setting up a Skype meeting, calling both conference rooms, and having a manager click on share my screen. Fortunately, it goes off without a hitch. And fish makes a mental note to schedule Skype training sessions for some key admins. Sharky is not Skype. Just send me your true tales of IT sharky@computerworld.com. A recent study on business leaders at the Global Leadership Summit in London found that by 2020, more than half of the company's full-time workforce will work remotely. A full 25% said that more than three quarters will not operate in the traditional office until 2020, which is not some distant, futuristic era. It's been six years. However, in many organizations, getting to work from home for a day or two a week is still considered a big perk that needs to be discussed. These facts seem to conflict until you realize that it depends on your definition of remote control, says Sara Sutton Fell, CEO of FlexJobs, a resource for job seekers looking for flexible positions. If remote work means you check the email on Sunday night, then congratulations! You already have a job from home. In most white-collar jobs, I would say 99% of people already work remotely because they do work at home. It creeps in our working style already. I think it's just not formalized by either the employer or the employee. If remote work means you check the email on Sunday night, then congratulations! You already have a job from home work. Generational changeBut that's not all that happens. Adam Kingl, director of learning solutions at the London Business School, points out that another topic that came up frequently at the Global Leadership Summit was millennials' approach to work. Flexibility is the number one reason they attract in the workplace, he says. People want to take the afternoon off and catch up on Saturday morning. With younger workers being fully aware that you can email or call someone from anywhere, the idea of working differently becomes a criterion that people are clearly looking for before they'll sign on to a dotted line, says Kingl. It's not a perk or a reward. More importantly, the oldest of these digital natives is now in their thirties. They have moved to the leadership. They're starting to be architects of working culture, Kingl says. When your boss knows that work is liquid, it can happen anywhere, anytime, then there is much less value to put on being around for your own sake. What about innovation and cooperation? So what about last year's debate, working remotely, was contrary to innovation? Some companies (such as Yahoo) have famously canceled telecommuting arrangements, claiming that people will come up with better ideas if they're physically in the same room. Participants at the World Leaders' Summit also made innovation in the workplace a high priority. Sutton Fell argues that the mistake is thinking that working remotely, and working in an office, are either/or proposals. Most people think of remote work as 100% of all or nothing, she says. But the reality we see is that it's not all or anything. People could visit clients two days a week, thus technically working remotely, even if they're not at home. Then they work in the office a day or two, and one day from home or in a café. Such a schedule allows for a lot of spontaneous interactions with colleagues, but also some targeted, head-down productivity too. In the near future, I believe that 50% of the workforce works remotely half the time, Sutton Fell says. I don't think 50% of the workforce will work 100% remotely by 2020, or even by 2030. But that's okay. There are many ways to work out and working remotely is a good tool to have a mix. Hello guys / girls I got a Playstation controller (CECH-ZRC1E) for its PS3, AMP and TV, but I want to sync my TV, but the problem is ... I do unknown TV (Terris LCD 2213, Medion, BEKE, TEVION), so I can not find the code as well as the PS3 remote is IF (infrared) and the original is RF (Radio Frequency) So my question is, is it possible to synchronize it in one direction? The option to find the codes isn't a problem, but if I can use the IF remote for rf removed (This is it, what I think its infrared and radio frequency when I block the top side of the original it wont work and the PS3 will react (tried it on the PS3 and it still reacts) I need to remote controll two 12 volt engines each need to operate independently of each other and both engines have to go back and forth if you have any tips or diagrams on how remote controll this please leave a comment.
