Choose an image that is at least 100KB in size. Save this image in the user's folder and then create a powerpoint that analyzes the work in detail after the four steps listed below. Criticism Instructions Students should follow these four steps in sequence: Step One: Description Make a list of all the things you see in the work without making any judgments about the job. Avoid only superficial observations. If possible, sketch a sketch of a work of art. Then list the things they noticed only after the sketches. It is important to use careful, unbiased observation. Include the size of the work and the environment you use in the description. Step Two: Analysis Pay close attention to what elements of art the artist used. Look for ways in which these elements were used to organize the composition using rhythm, balance, movement, proportion, variety, accent and unity. Step three: Interpretation Explain or tell us about the meaning or mood of the work. Please think creatively and creatively at this stage. However, base your interpretation on what you have completed in the first two steps. Step four: The decision is to decide whether the job is successful or has merit. You can base your judgment on one of the aesthetic theories of art: literal qualities, design qualities, expressive qualities. If possible, post art prints with student critics next to them or show them on a digital projector. Pen/pencil paper materials When you are assigned to write a magazine critique article, this may seem like a difficult task that requires too much effort. However, on closer inspection, you may notice that this type of letter has a clear structure with certain elements, making it easier to compose it step by step. In addition, your professor will probably provide you with articles criticizing the guidelines that will give you an idea of how a document of this kind should be written. Once you are informed of what is expected of your work, writing a magazine article of criticism becomes easier. You may wonder what kind of paper it is and what structure it requires. If you have these questions in your mind, the magazine's critique example presented in this article will help you learn the basic principles of the magazine's critique writing. First of all, you need to determine what type of magazine article you should criticize. This could be a review of the scientific literature, a review of a research article or a review of an empirical article. The example below to criticize the magazine presents a universal format of the magazine's criticism, regardless of the type of article. How to Organize Your Magazine Article Criticism: A Useful Journal of Criticism Example the name of the authors of the article. Provide the full and complete title of the article being analyzed. Mention of the magazine name, volume number and full date date Also include a certain number of pages of the article. Identify the underlying research issue discussed in the article. Discuss the main purpose of the author's article aimed at achieving, the study hypothesis, and the study's key findings/conclusions. The information above is part of the summary of the criticism of the magazine's article. However, since it is called criticism, it should focus on critically assessing the content of the article. Therefore, the bulk of your criticism of a magazine article should be devoted to your analytical article discussion. You should share your qualified perspective regarding the article under analysis. To do this, follow specific strategies: Read the article for the first time to get a general idea of what the article is about. Read the article again, this time applying your critical and analytical skills. During this reading, make sure to write down important points from the article along with your personal comments and comments. The example of the magazine's critique, published in this article, mentions the following questions that you should consider, providing criticism of the article: If the title is correctly formulated? I see? Is it appropriate? Is there an abstract in the article? Is the abstract specificity/clear/properly structured? Does the abstract reflect the main aspects/ideas/messages of the article? Is there a well-organized introduction with a clearly worded purpose of the article? Are there any factual errors? Are there any misinterpretations? Is the discussion logical and clear? Does this fit the topic at all? Does the author of the article use references to other scientific sources? Are the sources reliable and peer-reviewed? Has the literature used by the author been updated? Are there any ideas that are poorly discussed? Are there any sections/sections of the article that need to be reviewed? Which parts are illogical? What parts could be lowered? How can you assess the author's claims and statements? Are they clear/confusing/concise/concise/logical? What is the main assumption of the author? Is it achieved in the end? Is the author objective or subjective in his decisions? If the article you are analyzing is empirical and contains an experimental part, ask yourself the following questions: What is the purpose of the experiment? Is the experiment relevant in the field of research? Is there a proper discussion of experimental methods? Is the methodology suitable for research? Is the experiment described in vivid detail to duplicate it in the near future? Are the statistics and calculations correct? Are there repetitions in the discussion of the experiment? The main elements of the magazine article Critique Below are the main components that should be considered in your article critique essay writing: Article The first thing you need to do is go through the rubric handed out by your teacher and see the necessary style of reference, as it will determine the format of your entire paper. For example, criticism of an APA-style magazine is different from the MLA style criticism, and it's better to follow the correct formatting immediately than to rearrange it later. Typically, criticism should have a double distance, Times New Roman font size 12, and the use of subsections is advisory. In addition, it should have the following structure: Introduction: Represents information about the article and its author, and explains the purpose of your work. Body: Provides a critical analysis of an article, usually one argument per paragraph. Conclusion: Summarizes the stated ideas and gives a general assessment of the suitability and novelty of the article. Links: Pay special attention to the correct formatting of these works, both throughout the text and on the Link page.
