Advanage 20x reviews

And then I hang my head in shame, admitting that I bought a bottle of Advanage 20x Citrus Cleaner from a salesman who came knocking on my door today – a bottle that costs about five times what I would normally have paid for the regular cleaner in Walmart. I didn't stand a chance, really. Unlike in Malaysia, where sellers are not trained in NLP (Natural Language Processing), American vendors, it seems, are highly trained in using NLP persuasion and technology influence. Apparently if you don't have skills and knowledge (NLP), your interaction with sales people is like the interaction between an elementary school student and a special forces soldier intent on stealing the student's candy. You don't stand a chance (comment by Anonymous on Jess Riley's account of her Advanage experience) I didn't stand a chance. The young black gentlemen who came to my door were definitely a master of NLP persuasion. A guru, probably. He had a bag full of bottles of wonder-cleaning product that he claimed could clean anything and yet was biodegradable and non-toxic. He marked up a white cloth with a permanent marker and made me witness that the ink magically disappears when applying Advanage wonder cleaner dilution. He even drank some of that to show me how safe it was! He had jokes, high-fives, and a feel-good story about how my purchase would help fund his senior year at St. Augustine College. You help a young guy like me, sell soap, not dope The ones of you who know me, well, you know I'm a softy. It's just me. At the time, I was basically just trying to find a way to help the guy. I examined the label on the bottle and the words non-toxic and biodegradable and no phosphates meant I could actually use it. I asked him how many he had sold today. He told Two, and told me that his goal for today is 20, and if he scored 20, he'd be about to get his senior year of college paid for. You invest in me, in my future I asked him how many doors he had knocked on today. 23, he said. And he'd only sold two? Yes, but the two were the ones who were home and who had opened the door. Oh. It's like, a 100% conversion rate. I told you he was a well-educated NLP guru. (Watch Kenny Brook's sales pitch to get an idea of what I was up against). I depart My years in Malaysia have made me adept at avoiding salesmen. I pretend I'm not home (if it's a door-to-door salesman). All houses have fences and gates to keep vendors and other unwanted in check. I pretend I didn't see the seller, or look away unegennytligt – I've had plenty of practice doing this, thanks to the crippled beggars found scraping along the roads of every pasar malam. Here in the United States, there are it seems, no fences or gates. The odd fence is usually just Decoration. Unfortunately, the lack of fences means I'm defenseless against door-to-door door-to-door This typical rural home has no fences. The three small fences are decorative and add to the braking appeal. Back to history I balked when he told me the cheapest he had was $39 for a bottle as cleaner. He gets 8%, and 15% goes to St. Augustine for his school tuition (employee matching of sorts I guess) and the rest goes to the company. I said I'd rather just give him $10! Well, I don't have to tell you what the end was. Forty bucks. It works great. David Anderton, your friendly traveling Advanage salesman xo Gracie p.s.
