PwC's aid centre posted annual results earlier this week, with the company reporting record revenues of £3.6bn for the year ending June 30, 2017. That figure represented a 5 per cent rise in revenues to the £3.44 billion recorded in 2016. PwC's chairman and senior partner Kevin Ellis commented on the results that the company's priority is customer support and that investing in innovative new services such as artificial intelligence, virtual reality and cloud technology will enable customers to face their immediate and longer challenges and opportunities. They are transforming our business to ensure that we have the right skills and technologies to help with the challenges facing our customers as a result of the 4th Industrial Revolution. Building a vibrant and sustainable economy across the UK is vital for the UK to succeed after Brexit, and we need to play our part in this, Ellis said. So what does a closer look at PwC's strategic report indicate on the company's direction in the coming years? 1. Parties are number one Focus on the party will be primarily growth priorities, by strengthening customer relations a key element of the strategy. To do this, PwC has committed to increasing customer feedback and ensuring that the company offers innovative solutions to address customer business issues. 2. Growth supported by technology The company has advocated sustainable, profitable growth and investment in innovative enterprises to strengthen competitiveness. Investing in the future is a key theme here, as PwC plans to use technology to navigate uncertain environments such as Brexit and manage its business portfolio. Technology-based proposals have been emphasised as a growth priority. 3. People Empowering PwC said that promoting a flexible mindset and agile workforce will allow its staff to provide innovative solutions to customers. Pledging to maintain a shared and inclusive environment, the company also said it would raise awareness of mental health and wellbeing. In its annual report, PwC noted that social mobility initiatives have resulted in the employment of a more diverse workforce. In the 2017 study of the intake of graduates, 39% were first-generation graduates and 74% attended state schools. However, the company recently revealed that it has a 12.8 per cent pay gap with BAME and that it needs to do more to ensure BAME's talent advances to higher levels. 4. Promoting the technological revolution The company will focus on more efficient work digital advances, ensuring that PwC is linked to technology and innovation to promote the promotion of between employees, customers and business partners. Acknowledging that technology has brought about a strategic challenge, the company looks to embrace the technological revolution. 5. Integrity and promotion of standards For a company that conducts, for example, building a trustworthy relationship with government, regulators, the public and businesses. Encouraging initiatives to build a better society is also a priority with social mobility and tax justice high on the agenda. Innovation strategy buzzword Innovation 2017 is the main theme of PwC's strategic plan. As the company has now announced growth for the 14th year, it will certainly not want to reduce its 2018 report. So will PwC's goal become anonymity for innovation?
