At an investor meeting, Disney CEO Bob Iger confirmed that the company's next streaming service, Disney Plus, will eventually host the entire Disney animated film library, including a full list of animated films in the studio. Movies that talk about it traditionally have been kept in the 'vault' and basically came out every few years will be on service, Iger said, noting that Disney's full lineup should be available on Disney Plus somewhat shortly after the launch. This is a big change in Disney's policy. Currently, 34 Disney animated films - a collection of both classic features and their direct consequences to the video - reside in a theoretical space known as the Vault. Each movie in the basement is released on home video once every ten years. Once that customizing DVDs and Blue Rise sells out, new versions of the movie will not be printed until next time the movie comes into a due cellar cycle. The program is designed to keep Disney's animated shows fresh for young audiences and amplify demand for home video products. It is also a frustrating policy for Disney parents and fans. For example, as The Verge notes, there is currently no way to buy or broadcast new copies of Disney's original Aladdin despite the fact that a live remake of the action is making headlines thanks to its divisive trailer. Disney won't be stingy when it comes to adding new movies to Disney Plus, either. Iger said that new movies, such as Avengers: The End of the Game and Star Wars: Episode IX, will arrive on Disney Plus within a year of Release date. The addition of previously vaulted Disney movies makes Disney Plus a more attractive proposition for customers, although it's not just a selling point of sale. In addition to disney classics, Disney Plus will also host original content, including multiple Star Wars TV series, Marvel Cinematic Universe, The Spin-Off Steam, disney movies such as 3 Men and high fidelity. Disney Plus is expected to launch sometime before the end of 2019.
