Seriously, starting with That Old Gang of Mine, Mitch Miller and the Gang through 16 songs (some as medleys) that, even in 1958, felt like they were 100 years old. In fairness, they didn't feel like they were 150 years old when it sounded on CD in 2007 - to that degree, they had sort of become immortal - but they were certainly meant to attract parents and grandparents at the time of the album's release. Performances on songs such as Down by the Old Mill Stream, You Are My Sunshine, and By the Light of the Silvery Moon, are bold and powerful, with a slight touch of subtlety in the dynamics and accompaniment of reserves - often nothing more than harmonica or accordion, with a ukulele - and tempo, which makes them somewhat more attractive to hear as bodies than they are as individual tracks. In fact, Miller and company seem to have planned this album as a total, cohesive listening experience rather than a series of separate and isolated songs, since the numbers come almost exactly to each other, with almost no inters pause between. Among individual tracks, those who like Miller's hit renditions of The Yellow Rose of Texas will probably in the version of She Wore a Yellow Ribbon is shown here. The contrasting tempos and melodies are all chosen very carefully, for the greatest variation between songs, and everything counts right down to the light-hearted final track, Be Kind to Your Web-Footed Friends, which is here as a jocular, almost self-deprecating ending. It's almost a concept album, in that sense - and did Miller consciously step into the territory of the one-time most outspoken in-house critic, Frank Sinatra, lurking in his current berth at Capitol Records? -- and a very well made one. And while it's easy to mock this kind of music 50 years on, one should also remember that Sing Along with Mitch is one of the bigger selling albums in the Columbia Records library, remained in print for decades and garnered enough sales to get it released as part of the first wave of CD budget label prices (alongside albums like Paul Revere & the Raiders' Greatest Hits etc.), thirty years after Bruce Eder~Open Monday-Friday: 9:00am-10:00pm, Weekends: 11:00am-7:00pm (Eastern Time) Se habla Español!
