Rather, it is the ability to drive people to achieve great heights of performance and success and to demonstrate that the characteristics will follow employees through choice-passion, purpose, listening, and giving meaning to their role. Many senior leaders expect employees to follow them because of their title, their company ownership, or their place in the organization's hierarchy. And many employees do follow a leader for these reasons. But that doesn't mean the leader inspires their best work, support and contribution. An inspirational leader doesn't just tell employees that they're deeply committed to their customer's experience. The leader must demonstrate this commitment and passion in each meeting, presentation and in how they deal with customer problems. The leader's behavior should inspire employees to behave the same way. Communication, integrity, inclusion and sensitivity to the needs of the employees around the characteristics and characteristics of an inspirational leader. No one is inspired by a leader who people think doesn't care about them. The ability to communicate that passion, purpose and meaning to others helps establish the inspiring culture of your organization. The inspirational leader feels passionate about the vision and mission of the organization. They are also able to share that passion in a way that enables others to feel passionate as well. Shared passion makes organizations rise in achieving their mission and vision. The nature of the vision and mission is critical to energized others to feel as if their work has a purpose and meaning beyond the tasks they perform every day. Sometimes leaders need to help their staff connect the 1 ones by explaining this big picture to everyone. Communicating the big picture will regularly help strengthen the reason your organization exists. The inspirational leader listens to the people in their organization. Talking to people about your passion is not enough. To share meaning—a favorite and meaningful definition of communication—you should allow the ideas and thoughts of your staff to help shape the vision and mission, or minimally, the goals and action plan. No one is ever 100% supportive of a direction they had no part in formulating. People should see their ideas incorporated — or understand why they weren't. To experience inspiration, people need to feel included. Inclusion goes beyond the area of listening and providing feedback. For real inclusion, people should feel intimately connected to the actions and processes that lead to achieving the goals or the final decision. For example company canceled an annual employee event due to customer orders for their product. Lots of people people not liked the decision, but the company engaged the management team, the Activity Committee members and many other employees in the conversation about whether to cancel or reschedule the event. The inclusion led to a compromise that enabled a smaller celebration and a positive morale boost, but allowed the company to meet customers' needs. As customer needs are crucial, and the employees agreed, the company's decision — made with employee input — left nothing to push back. Vision and passion are important, but your employees should trust you if you want them to feel inspired. They should believe in your integrity and see it downplayed in decision-making and treatment of customers and employees. Who you are as a person is as important as the direction you provide. Employees look up at a person telling the truth, trying to do the right things, living a principled life, and doing their best. Your actions play out on the stage of your organization. Behaviors that align with what you say is always center stage. An inspirational leader gives people what they want within their abilities. For example, you can't provide a pay rise if the company doesn't achieve profit goals. But you have to share the rewards if the organization is doing well. The inspirational leader also understands that, while money is a motivator, so is praise, recognition, rewards, say thank you, and noted an individual's contribution to a successful effort. Speaking directly to a contributing employee about the value their work provides for the organization is an important source of inspiration for the recipient. The actions you take at work every day are powerful. Here are the qualities and actions associated with successful leaders: Choose to lead. Be the person others choose to follow. Provide vision for the future. Provide inspiration. Make other people important and appreciated. Live your values. Act ethically. Set the pace by your expectations and example. Establish an environment of continuous improvement. Provides opportunities for people to grow, both personally and professionally. Care and act with compassion. Compassion.
