[1] Plot in the far countryside of Mirabilis, the warlord Dragon-Eye has unleashed its formidable power to hunt down the source of all power, the legendary Crucible. The knights include Adric, a fraudster; John Serragoth, assassin; Perfidia, an elven fighter who is the niece of a witch who sits on the kingdom's council; and Ber-Lak, an goblin miner infected by contact with a mysterious element known as blood steel. You can help Wikipedia by expanding it.vte This article related to a Canadian TV film is a dead end. Wikipedia can be helped by expanding it.vte Dwarves, goblins and people collectively occupy the world of the Knights of Bloodsteel, another sloppily constructed two-part fantasy that is closer to the Mighty Morphin Power Rangers than the Lord of the Rings. The first part is so confusing that I actually had to check to make sure I didn't jump on the second DVD by mistake, before settling into this small-scale quest, among other things, some of the goofiest-looking dragons ever. Harmless but also mindless, this acronym for my notes - K's bs - pretty well sums things up. RHI Entertainment always lands someone with marquee value to spice up these stews, and here it is Christopher Lloyd as the witch elf of Tesselink, looking like he longs to go back to the future - or at other times that is a functioning plot and less ridiculous dialogue. Close as I might say, the evil muppet-headed Dragon Eye (Mark Gibbon) has set its sights on monopolising the island of Mirabilis with supply of blood- toted, magical magical properties. To thwart him and his minions, Tesselink learns of the prophecy of four warriors who are the only hope to stop dragon eye before he finds the Crucible and thus controls all bs in the world. D.C. knights include Serragoth (David James Elliott, running a weird not-quite-Scottish brogue), a sword-wielding human bounty hunter; elf Perfidia (Natassia Malthe), who, like Tesselink, has mystical powers, as well as the cutest little fangs; Adric (Christopher Jacot), conman; and Ber-Lak (Dru Viergever), a goblin slowly mastering his telekinetic abilities. Other than ample exposure to the British Columbia landscape (better chewing), the project's main recommendation point should be its makeup effect, with goblins resembling kids Nosferatu and Orkid Rings. Computer-generated dragons, by contrast, look completely cheesy, and when one of them becomes a kind of invisible (effects somewhat like a Predator), it's more of a relief than excitement. Written by Sam Egan and directed by Philip Spink, the project certainly has a juvenile tone - as Serragoth and Perfidia spend most of the action coming to this close kissing, making the whole thing feel designed for 7-year-old boys who would find that icky. But at the same time, that would at least be an excuse for unhappy banter, which includes barking taunts during a fight like: Shut up, or I'll fill it in my guts. To survive by doing battle K's bs, you can also require something to cover your eyes and plug your ears. © 1996-2014, Amazon.com, Inc. or its affiliates 1.
