My side of the mountain project ideas Taking on a new side project can be a bit scary. After all, the chances of failure are quite high, and dealing with failure is never fun. That said, 99U points out that one way to get around this fear is to treat your secondary projects as experiences. The reason is very simple. When we picture something as an experience, we agree with failure. So, right from the start, you start your brain to handle the possibility of failure. 99U explains why it works: To recover from my own fear of failure with them, I began to imagine these ideas as simply being experiences. Experiments do not fail, they simply prove or refute a hypothesis. For example, despite my work as a designer, I had the assumption that I could also write an ebook. So I just started writing. I didn't focus on the result, how the book would be received or what others would think of it. I thought, Let's try. It's definitely one way to deal with that. Head to 99U for a great collection of tips to deal with this fear and break your projects into experiences. Make your secondary projects a huge success: treat them like experiments 99UPhoto by Steve Jurvetson. For men and women held in the bondage of slavery (and his memory), the ideals of liberation are high. Therefore, the promise of Jesus' liberation for all, combined with the imagery of the Sermon on the Mountain, was dear to African Americans. Chances are it has become the inspiration for the spiritually catchy Go, Tell It on the Mountain was popularized in 1879 when it was performed by the Jubilee Singers of Fisk University, a school formerly specialized in the education of freed slaves. 1. Go say it on the mountain, on the hills and everywhere, Go say it on the mountain, May Jesus Christ be born! When I was a researcher, I was looking night and day, I asked the Lord to help me, and He showed me the way. Oh! Go say it on the mountain, on the hills and everywhere, go say it on the mountain, that Jesus Christ was born! 2. While the shepherds kept their flocks silent o'er observed at night, Here in heaven He shone a holy light. 3. The shepherds feared and trembled When lo! above the earth ranget he angel choir that saluted the birth of our Savior. 4. Down in a humble manger The humble Christ was born, and God sent us salvation That blessed with Christmas. It is the first line of defense against a range of natural challenges, including howling winds, pouring rain, hot sun and bitter cold. Under the circumstances, it is not surprising that grain and grime tend to accumulate over time. As a result, savvy homeowners incorporate outdoor cleaning into their semi-annual maintenance routines for a number of compelling reasons. First, it cannot be ignored that the condition of your siding has a significant impact on the attractiveness of your home, i.e. how it appears to visitors and casual passers-by. Second, giving your siding once a year gives you the chance to identify and solve all problems from the beginning, before they take off steam and become extensive and costly headaches to solve that could steal years of the expected life of the siding. Indeed, from an aesthetic and pragmatic point of view, it is never wise to go long without thinking about the wood, brick, stucco or vinyl that coats your home. In general, experts recommend seasonal inspection and cleaning as required. But according to Jim Eldredge, product manager at Sears Home Services, it's important to remember that different siding materials have different, often very different, often very different, care requirements. Read on below for expert advice on cleaning and maintaining many of today's best-known and most widely installed types of exterior cladding. Photo: fotosearch.comCleaning Wood Siding A eternal favorite, wood coating boasts timeless, undeniable beauty, but of all types of siding lanes, Eldredge says, it's probably the most demanding. On the one hand, it must be painted (or stained) about every five years. In addition, as the wood expands naturally and contracts, all windows and doors should be checked regularly, reapplying caulking if necessary, he adds. In addition, for the wooden siding to be not only efficient, but also good, it requires an annual or semi-annual cleaning. Most of the time, Eldredge says, You can get away with using soapy water and a soft bristle brush. But in special cases, for example, to remove stains of mold, mold or algae, you must rub with a solution of bleach (part) and water (four parts). A note of caution: Don't use pressure washer, warns Eldredge. It would be faster and easier than cleaning by hand, but often it hurts a lot more than good. Brick Siding CleaningA centuries-old siding material that usually lasts a lifetime, brick has long delighted homeowners with its historic appearance, its own impression and its aura of strength. That said, as durable as brick can be, Eldredge points out that its longevity depends in part on annual cleaning. Under ideal conditions, as long as the siding remains in good condition, without chipped, chipped, brick, cracked and crumbling mortar — maintenance involves completely spraying the entire house. Complicating matters is that, according to Eldredge, some parts of the structure that don't get a lot of sun can get mold or foam growth. Check these shady areas, and if you find a problem, feel free to bring out the bleach and water, about a cup of the first and a gallon of the second. Cleaning Stucco SidingPortland cement, sand, lime or gypsum combine to create stucco, a material with an ancient heritage that remains as popular as ever. Versatility is one of its main advantages: the material can take on a wide variety of colors and textures. The downside? Its rigid composition makes it vulnerable to flaking and cracking. Skilled people can patch small areas on their own with store-bought stucco fillers, but for larger repairs, it's wise to hire a pro, Eldredge recommends. Like plastering, proper application of stucco takes, as eldredge says, the kind of skills you develop only after years of experience. You don't need to be an expert to clean the material, however. Spray the outside with hot, soapy water It's important to start at the foundation level and work up, he says. In this way, the stucco near the base of the building does not absorb gallons of dirty water. Vinyl Sidishing Track Cleaning There's a Vinyl Reason Has Become the Most Popular Type of Sidip in America, Eldredge said. It's practically maintenance-free. Continuing, he notes that options such as the WeatherBeater vinyl siding, installed exclusively by Sears Home Services, actually offer the appearance of a traditional wooden siding, just without all the hassle. For example, vinyl does not need to be refinanced; it remains colorfast for years. In addition, vinyl is not sensitive to many of the factors that affect other materials — rot, for example, and parasites such as termites. If your vinyl coating has become a bit dirty, don't worry, cleaning couldn't be easier. Even stubborn stains tend to come out with a garden hose. In the end, this is what makes it a great choice for people who don't have the time or energy to maintain When well maintained, the outdoor siding can last for decades. But no siding lasts forever. There comes a time when, in order to ensure continuous protection from the elements, you must install a brand new siding. Fortunately, there are many benefits to be gained from an upgrade. Eye-catching appeal to curbs, increased resale value of homes, improved energy efficiency and Lower maintenance requirements are just some of the reasons owners choose a category leader like WeatherBeater. While the re-siding can be an overwhelming prospect, companies like Sears Home Services will guide you through the entire project, all the way from selecting new hardware to final installation. Better yet, unlike many local entrepreneurs, the Sears brand offers a guarantee of satisfaction. Plan a free home consultation as soon as you're ready. Entrepreneurship can be an island experience. Founders find so many disparate elements of their companies competing for their time that they cannot adequately respond to everyone, let alone take time for projects, personal or professional. Related: Meerkat was just a secondary project. Here's how it became a viral sensation. Yet this attitude can ultimately be unhealthy, and lead entrepreneurs to cut themselves off from the people and lawsuits they care about the most. Personal passions are good for your mental health. If you are the head of an organization, you have probably found that you are supposed to be operating at peak performance. To meet the challenges that lie ahead, you need to recharge, taking time for personal activities. Not only is this time well spent because it's good for you, but you owe it to your clients and employees not to compromise your mental health by getting burned at work. Burnout occurs because the natural response to the feeling of work overflow is that overworked contractors throw themselves deeper into their work. This is a double-edged sword, because not taking the time for the activities they like will probably increase their stress level and make it harder to be effective leaders. David Heinemeier Hansson, creator of the Ruby on Rails web development executive and founder of Basecamp, wrote on his blog Signal v. Rumor that he fulfills both his personal and professional ambitions by making quality time. With this strategy, he writes, he is able to work 40 hours a week, sleep eight and a half to nine hours a day and take the time to pursue his personal passions. Those passions? In addition to being a best-selling author, Hansson is also a champion racing-car driver. Then there are these semi-professional secondary projects that David Hieatt describes Medium like You know, those ideas that just aren't going to go away. This little idea at the back of your head that keeps bothering you. Your activities help you connect with family and friends. The key to strong bonds is common interest and values. These commonalities give you integrated activities to do with others, opportunities to attend social meetings and topics interesting conversation for all concerned. Common personal interests are among the most important bridges that connect you to your loved ones, and it is important if you are an entrepreneur to put work into maintaining these personal relationships. Related: 6 business moguls with seriously expensive side projectsAfter everything, you will need the support of those people as you navigate the complicated journey of setting up and running a business. Although your friends and family are not familiar with the specific challenges you face, they know you well and can comfort and help you when the need arises. For billionaire and serial entrepreneur Richard Branson, for example, exercise is a daily must. As a result, Branson can be found kite-surfing. And when he invited Barack Obama to Necker Island, the entrepreneur used their shared love for water sports to bond and relax. Personal projects can replace professional ambitions The people who work traditional jobs from 9 to 5 years old talk nostalgically about the possibility of becoming entrepreneurs in order to do something they are passionate about. It is a good idea in theory, and in some cases it works. But people who have actually taken steps to start their own business know that entrepreneurship is more often motivated by customers and markets than by personal passions. So while the dream of turning a hobby into a successful business experts will remind you that the market is motivated by opportunity, not self-interest. This is one more reason why it is important for you to adopt activities outside of running your business. After all, you may be passionate about serving your customers, but the day-to-day realities of running the business will sometimes drain you of your enthusiasm. Consider David Hieatt, the author of the Medium article that owns Hiut Denim Co., with his wife Clare started their howies hockey band business as a secondary project in 1995. They didn't make money out of it until 2001. It was our secondary project for six years before it became the thing that put food on our table. How did we fund ourselves during this period? Simply, keeping our day jobs, Hieatt wrote. In the end, this small secondary project paid off. It was sold to Timberland. Why did the couple use the money? No more secondary projects. For me, the importance of secondary projects is to leave this precious time for a young idea to protected from the world, Hieatt wrote. He described these secondary projects as something in which he and Clare can channel their creativity and passion, without the financial stress of having to increase income or even turn a profit. After all, there is no deadline, and risks are allowed. And, more importantly, these personal projects can be a source of pleasure and happiness. By growing my own business, Amerisleep, I have learned that my business can only prosper when I am balance professional responsibilities alongside my personal interests.
