The effort comes in response to efforts to recruit extremist groups, which employ simplified narratives aimed at reducing political complexity, highlighting perceived social grievances, and bringing together potential members to demonize specific faith groups, races, ethnicities, and cultures. ISIS and al-Qaeda, for example, pedal narratives of victimization, martyrdom and the notion that the West is at war with Islam to encourage resentment and encourage individuals to take extremist causes. Neo-Nazi organizations similarly employ narratives focused on victimization, and can also exploit perceived grievances focused on class and race to recruit new members and gain political momentum. Activists working to undermine extremist narratives deploy counter-narrative messages in response, in an effort to contradict extremist messaging and deter potential recruits. Examples of counter-narratives may include point-by-point withdrawal of extremist arguments, personal stories told by former extremists, lectures and sermons denouncing violence, and multimedia campaigns created by activists and individual organizations.
