Minimum wage earners are more common than many people think. There are 2.3 million Californians working on the minimum wage. Statistics on the number of people who get this base salary at the city or county level are not readily available. But census bureau statistics can give us some idea of who is in that range at the local level. The federal minimum wage is $7.25 per hour. In California, the minimum wage is $8 an hour. Those who work 40 hours a week in state rates earn $16,640 a year before taxes. San Ramon has 489 households earning between $10,000 and $15,000 a year, according to the Census Bureau. Another 512 households take home between $15,000 and $25,000 a year. Chandlerick Dorsey, 19, was close to death and in a coma for two months, but his mother's faith saw him through and gave him a new lease of life. Not all of these people are minimum wage earners. Some people work part-time. Others may earn just above the minimum wage. Some retirees may be on Social Security or other benefits. Some households may have two part-time wage earners. Chandlerick Dorsey, 19, was close to death and in a coma for two months, but his mother's faith saw him through and gave him a new lease of life. But low-wage employees are at the center of debate in Sacramento and Washington over whether to raise the minimum wage. In Congress, Rep. George Miller (D-Martinez) and other representatives are getting the House to vote on a bill to raise wages. But the House has not taken up the issue since rejecting a similar proposal in March. President Obama proposed raising it from $7.25 to $9 an hour. At the state Capitol, a bill to raise the minimum wage to $9.25 over the next three years was approved by the state legislature in late May. This raises the minimum wage to $10 over four years and increases it by $2. There are a number of business-oriented groups that oppose such a minimum wage increase. Among them is The California Restaurant Association. Matt Sutton, the group's vice president of government affairs, They say the proposal would be a huge burden on many California businesses. It's incredibly aggressive. It's too much, too fast and the timing is off, he said. Sutton says the minimum wage is a starting salary, not a permanent salary. He noted that if the minimum wage increased by $2, it would be $80 a week for all full-time employees at that rate. In the majority of California's 22,000 eateries, many of which operate at a profit margin of 2 to 5 percent, it may be too much to absorb. He also added that an increase in the minimum wage would put rising pressure on employers to raise salaries for workers who are just above the minimum wage. It will strain the limited labor dollars that restaurants have, he said. He said restaurants are trying to re-recover as the country pulls out of this recession and faces a federal tax hike on January 1. He also opposes the fight that a minimum wage increase would increase consumer spending by low-wage employees and help the economy as a whole. He said it would only work if companies did not lay off workers or reduce their hours. Those who support raising the minimum wage oppose it. Mitch Seaman of the California Labor Federation said minimum wage workers are the type of consumers who spend every dollar they get, so their wage boost will soon be pumping back into the economy. Raising the minimum wage is also important to them for the economy, he said. He also pointed out that the minimum wage is a program that ensures that everyone in work has enough to stay alive. Too many people will fall through the cracks without it, he said. They will be left out even more than they already are. Seaman and Jack Temple of the National Employment Law Project say two-thirds of minimum-wage employees work for large companies that employ more than 100 people. Typical jobs include maids, clerks, dishwashers, and fast food workers. Waitresses, waiters and other workers who get tips are also typically paid the minimum wage as a base salary. Temple and Seaman say these companies can afford to pay their workers more. I think we need to share the benefits with them, Temple. Patch contacted Walmart and McDonald's for comment on this story, but we received no response. Temple and Seaman say minimum wage workers rely on family, second jobs and government assistance. They rely on programs like food stamps, Medicaid, and federal housing to make ends go. You'll also skip doctor visits and trips to restaurants to save money. They can do it at a high cost, Seaman said. They say an increase in the minimum wage would reduce these employees' reliance on government programs and save taxes. They point to a congressional report analyzing the impact of Walmart's minimum wage employees on taxpayers. Minimum Hiking is good for everyone, Temple said. With a few exceptions, nearly all employees in California are required to pay the minimum wage required by state law. From January 1, 2017, the minimum wage for all industries will be raised year by year. From January 1, 2017 to January 1, 2022, the minimum wage will be increased for employers employing 26 or more employees. The increase will be delayed by a year from January 1, 2018 to January 1, 2023 for employers with 25 or fewer employees. Scheduled increases can be temporarily suspended by the governor based on specific decisions. (Please refer to the table below for the schedule of rate hikes.) For more information and guidance on how employers count employees to determine whether they qualify as 25 or fewer employers, see the New Minimum Wage Phase in Requirements 2017-2023. There are employees who are exempt from minimum wage laws, such as outside salespeople, employer parents, spouses, individuals who are children, and apprentices who are regularly indented under the State Apprenticeship Standards Division. Minimum Wage Order (MW-2019) Regardless of age, there are exceptions for learners who may be paid more than 85% of the minimum wage rounded to the university's closest nickel during their first 160 hours of employment in a profession with no previous similar or related experience. There are also exceptions for employees of the mentally handicapped, disabled, or both, as well as nonprofit organizations such as protected workshops and rehabilitation facilities that employ people with disabilities. Such individuals and entities may issue special licenses from the Labor Standards Enforcement Department to authorize employment at wages below the statutory minimum wage.
