With the right education and training, these nurses can play an important role in combating sexual assault and other violence. Forensic nurses primarily work with victims of crime, document their injury and collect other evidence. They also collect samples from criminals, provide expert testimony in cases and sometimes assist police in crime scenes. The starting point for a career in forensic nursing is to become a registered nurse. It needs an associate or bachelor's degree, which takes two to four years, then approves the National Council License Examination for RNs. The next step is formal training in forensics. There are several courses available, especially adult and paidiatruck versions of sexual assault nurse-in-the-examination certification and the emerging high-end practice forensic nurse portfolio confirmation. Information about both can be found on the website of the International Association of Forensic Nurses. Forensic nursing as a special began in 1992, when Afin was established in Maniapolis. The founders, who primarily worked with victims of sexual assault, recognized the growing need for practicing nurses whose expertise could provide a bridge between medicine and law enforcement. The American Nurses Association recognized Afin in 1995, making forensic nursing a formal part of the healthcare industry. Nursing is in the control of a high tension, and forensic nursing can be particularly difficult. Working with victims of sexual assault and other violent crimes can be emotionally done, especially in the pediatocral area. Taking evidence from suspected criminals can be dangerous, even when they are in custody and under control. Forensic nursing is a new coffee speciality that is difficult to compensate about. In many cases, it is important to advocate for a position to produce motivated nurses with forensic training. Nurses with reseration certification usually get 1.5 times their normal hourly rate to perform forensic work, although some institutions pay only a flat fee per call. Generally, nurses are at the high end of the RN pay scale with similarly high-class qualifications.
