The user calls the trial fish and complains: My computer will not work on any network applications. What happens when you try? fish asks. Nothing! the user says. I just get something like Network not found an error. Does it affect anyone else there? fish asks. No, just me, the user replies. Can you try a couple of things for me? No, it's not really, I'm not at my computer and calling from another table. Why? I just changed the cab and my phone isn't working yet. So the fish makes a hike to the user's cube. After a quick check of the computer and its connections, he turns to the user. Who connected to my computer again? he asks. I did, says the user. Um, the cable is connected to the phone jack from your computer, and the phone line is connected to the LAN socket. Well, I didn't! The Massachusetts Institute of Technology, using edX 132 Write a review of Urban Planning Courses Sustainability Courses Cities have built site after location. Site planning has been taught in urban planning, landscape architecture and architectural programs for over a century and remains the basis of course for those who aspire to plan the built environment. This is a necessary topic for licensing and certification programs for each of these disciplines. Mastering art site planning requires essential knowledge, well-honed design skills, and knowledge of examples and prototypes of a site organization. This course provides perspectives for leading academics and practitioners on important issues when preparing territory plans. It offers the basis for news, and the opportunity to apply what is learned in the preparation of the site plan. The course is organized in 10 one-week units, each of which has 3-6 video training modules. Each module is presented by an expert in the field covered by: Gary Hack, Mary Anne Ocampo, Brent Ryan, Dennis Frenchman, Shail Joshi, Zhuangyuan Fan, Eran Ben-Joseph, Jim Wescoat, Carlo Ratti, Larry Vale, Bob Simha and Tunney Lee from MIT; Dennis Pierprz, Elaine Limmer, Greg Havens and Martin Zogram from Sasaki; and Lynne Sagalyn from Columbia University. Topics covered by each week are: Introduction: Site values; greenfield and urban areas. Site analysis: analysis of the natural place; man has made a context of the sites; infrastructure capacity; development rules and policies; places as a integrating the site's knowledge. Site planning methods: planning processes; processes; stakeholders and the public; the economic value of the territories; design methods; digital media design; creating a site proposal. Infrastructure of the site: stormwater management; Finish the streets; pedestrian kingdoms; water supply and disposal; energy to objects; intelligent infrastructure. Site concepts and performance: create sites; subdial and location node; scoring space performance; impact assessment. Residential areas: history of residential sites; typology of housing forms; housing and community design; densely living objects. Place for sale and work: prototypes of shopping; workplaces; innovation areas; e-commerce planning. Recreation and cultural places: Landscape structure; urban public spaces; human development and play; cultural areas. Planning of colleges and universities: types of universities; Campus form and communication; new universities; networked campuses; adaptation capacity planning. Community planning: development of mixed use; new communities; the future of communities; concluding remarks. Students will be tested in 4 quizzes on their understanding of the materials covered. In addition to viewing modules, students will be able to prepare a plan for the territory in three stages: site analysis (3 weeks); program and concept plan (4 weeks) and a detailed plan for part of the site's public domain (3 weeks.) The course will provide basic data on two sites that can be used in this exercise. Alternatively, students can choose a site in their community and use it for their project. Or, if the course is taken in parallel with a university-level study or workshop, the results can be submitted for sorting and feedback. Please note that tasks are only available to students who signed up for verified certificates. 0.0 rating based on 0 reviews Start your review of Site Planning Online ProsOffers money loans.
