Robotics is the science of creating artificial intelligence. From the simplest automated machines to the most complex real transformers, robots are more common than you can imagine. Previously immune to the threat of techno replacement (without wanting to count robot pets like Sony's Aibo), sheepdogs in New Zealand are currently facing competition from the wave of automation rape, thanks to the Boston Dynamics' Spot robot. A new video shows spot plants conducting a variety of auxiliary farming tasks, including inspection and, yes, sheep herding. While it's unlikely that a real-life sheepdog will be afraid of Boston Dynamics' limiting machine, it's a pretty impressive show for the dog-inspired robot. The video, released on May 19, shows Spot wandering through robust environments to capture real-time data. This information can then be fed back to those in need. A press release issued by Boston Dynamics and robot operations software platform Rocos explains how this can be useful in scenarios such as helping farmers access information such as more accurate and up-to-date yield estimates. The era of autonomous robots is upon us, Rocos CEO David Inggs said in a statement. Said. We are working with organizations like Boston Dynamics to accelerate the adopting of robotics. By connecting robots to the cloud, we can help them combine the cloud software layer with robots to achieve physical automation at scale. Our customers are increasing their human workforce to automate physical processes that are often boring, dirty or dangerous. Boston Dynamics isn't the only company working in the real world. ANYbotics, the Swiss robotics company that makes four-legged ANYmal robots, exists began using robots to carry out tasks such as inspections on oil drilling rigs. Eventually, the value of these robots will be seen here. No, farmers won't eliminate centuries of tradition by replacing their dogs with robots. But to show really useful applications and tasks is that you will do what you do in the business case for robots like Spot and ANYmal. If they can really prove their worth in this way, that's something much more valuable than another fun viral video showing robots' impressive dance moves in the lab. Editors' Advice You Need It. Sign Up for Our Newsletter Latest News Money Photo Manage: lilmiquela/Instagram On the shortlist of people who are a non-terrible 2020, Miquela Sousa is the computer-generated avatar better known as Lil Miquela. This is mostly because it is not real, at least not in the word sense of living, breathing, human beings. So he doesn't have to worry about getting COVID-19 or paying his rent. In fact, OnBuy is estimated to make €8,960,000 a year, or over $10 million - for the company that created it, that is, called Brud, according to an analysis published in Bloomberg last week by a UK-based online marketplace. Brud, who didn't respond for comment, doesn't want to call Lil Miquela an influencer. On the contrary, she is a digital character with good taste in clothing and a budding music career. But part of his income comes from paid partnerships with brands. OnBuy, which has 2.8 million followers on Instagram, estimates it charges about $8,000 per sponsored post, making it the highest-earning robot influencer by a large margin. (Comparison, @noonoouri, is the second highest paid robot influencer on the OnBuy list, which makes about $1,600 per post.) In the past, Lil Miquela has campaigned for Calvin Klein. More recently, he tried to promote the new Galaxy Z flip-phone with Samsung. She has also been tagging Amazon Fashion recently, though she has made no indication of sponsorship. Of course, at the end of the day, Lil Miquela's income goes to the real person. (Links in his Instagram bio are also directed to charity.) Still, these numbers are too much to handle. [Hits 'Eject'] Sources Bloomberg Sorry, How Much Money Does Lil Miquela Make? If you can't afford a divorce, raise your hand. Money may not really buy happiness, but it can buy freedom, and that eventually turns into happiness. I can't deny my need for this, especially when I eat pasta several times a week with the kids and I can't enjoy it almost as much as they do. My husband moved out less than three months ago. Two-thirds of my household income is with him. Now I can walk the fine line of getting the money we need from him, but I'm leaving him some money, too. Believe me, spiteful, grumpy little Ellie in a red devil costume perched on one of my shoulders, I should have thrown her stuff on the grass. I should have taken his bank cards and confiscated our joint accounts and shouted gleefully when he begged me for enough money to put down a deposit at a caravan park in the country south of town. Realistically, it's not an option when you have young children. I want her to live in a safe and beautiful place because my children will live with her. I also have a constant battle with my personal pride. I just wanted child support, co-support and a reasonable level. Part of me just wants to keep having to take a dime from him. I imagine you telling your girlfriend that his wife is still taking all his money. He's stupid, I know. His money pays off a mortgage that I can't pay alone in the only house my kids know about. He buys food and pays for utilities. Right now, between his money and my salary, the bills are being met, and then there's very little left. I wonder how many divorced women dream of winning the lottery? This content is created and protected by a third party and transferred to this page to help users provide their email address.
