According to Edward Rock, director of the Open Course Initiative We chose edX to expand our MOOC services specifically because of their open source platform Penn and Coursera Penn were one of Couseara's four original college partners and had a stake in Coursera through a $3.7M joint investment with Caltech. After Johns Hopkins University, Penn is the second largest course provider with more than 40 courses. In July 2014, Penn announced that it had enrolled more than 2.3 million students on Coursera and had issued more than 90,000 Completion Reports. Open Learning at Penn: Year Two UPenn and edX UPenn are not the first universities to offer courses on both edX and Coursera (others include Rice University, University of California – Berkeley, Caltech). What should we read about this, that universities do not want to be locked into a single MOOC platform provider? That they are increasing their negotiating leverage? Or perhaps they see important feature differences important in different situations? Alas, the answer may well be that universities simply want the flexibility to experiment (at top universities, tenured faculty tend to have a good deal of speaking in the way they operate). The first few courses Penn will offer on edX are: • Global Trends Analysis for Business and Society • Laws and Intellectual Property Policies • Going Out on a Read: Chi Anatomy On As a Note, two of these courses have been previously offered on the Coursera platform. Therefore, they seem to have the right to reuse their content on alternative MOOC platforms. For the first time since 1860, the University of California quietly unveiled a radical new logo design last month. But it didn't go unnoted by students, alumni, and others linked to the organization. A protest against the change has been building steadily - and has now reached mammoth proportions, with more than 37,000 people signing an online petition so far, while facebook's campaign has attracted more than 4,000 likes. New logo minimalism and modernity Few people may be surprised by the strong reaction, since the new modern, minimalist logo (above) is a big start compared to the old one. Its simple, wide, and brash yellow font contrasts sharply with the monumental-looking 144-year-old logo (below). Designed by an in-house team, the new logo is available in a variety of colors, including pastel, and has been introduced mainly because the intimate details of the old brand don't reproduce well digitally. The replacement of the old logo, used for 144 years, led to a storm of protests against the new Logo that was used on the university president's website and its California Onward campaign. However The original logo will still be used, appearing on official university texts and documents. In response to the protests, the university's director of marketing communications Jason Simon said: What we've been trying to do is create an iconic, flexible and solid enough sign that it works to represent the entire UC system. The brand can be used in a combination of different UC blues and gold as well as in a my myth of applications. The seal is amazing and carries a heritage and tradition. They also show bureaucracy, staidness, and other not-so-great characteristics. Much of this is evident in the testing and discussion we have done as part of this process. What do you think? NBC Universal CEO Steve Burke told employees on Thursday a town hall that gathers old logos, including the iconic cong logo, seems a bit busy. The company is currently choosing a new minimalist company design. The the logo uses purple as the primary color, and does not set a gap between 'NBC' and 'Universal,' to represent the unity of the two parts. We are not a family of two favorite sons, instead one filled with talented people and companies all tied to the first, the manager said in a presentation on Thursday when it unveiled the logo to company employees. NBC will continue to use the original public image for its broadcast network and its cable news stores, while Global Spin will still be part of Universal's consumer graphics. The public has been part of NBC's brand since 1956. After a year of regulatory review, Comcast is set to get a 51% stake in NBC Universal on Friday, while General Electric's shares will drop to 49% from 80%.
