I like to get into in-depth conversations about this production or the shot or the effects in the film. In my freelance work, I have the opportunity to sit down with many of the best creatives in the business. Every now and then, it's all about animation, which is close to my heart for perhaps obvious family reasons. One of these moments occurred when I was digging into the production of Incredibles 2 with the production designer at Pixar, Ralph Eggleston. I previously posted a snippet of an interview with him, in which he spoke briefly about pitching for a short he made with Pixar, For the Birds, which went on to win an Oscar for animated shorts. Ralph Eggleston Some of Ralph Eggleston's favorite production story angles during the production of films such as Brave, Wall-E and UP were color script developments. While the story arc will propel the film through its peaks and troughs, the color script will illustrate and The dramatic emotion arcs it through the use of thematic shades of color. One of the differences between producing Incredibles 2 and some previous films from Pixar is that Eggleston actually couldn't do Color Script for the show. About a year from its release, we found we had fewer years to make the film, Eggleston said. Toy Story 4 will not be ready for its 2018 release and so it was decided to change the date for Incredibles 2, and boy that seemed like a very pleasant decision at the time. Little did we know how challenging it was but we managed to do it. In doing this, the Incredibles 2 crew at Pixar used some completely new technology. When USD's new technology is brought online in the studio, artists can start turning on movies much earlier than ever before. Eggleston will usually have time to design color scripts and understand emotionally through lines. Color Script is an illustration of as much of the story as it is an illustration of a character's emotion throughout the story, he explained. In this production, the film changed so much under our feet because we made it and we had less time a year. Eggleston blocks it very roughly with themes and color ideas, does scene painting, references and works closely with the DOP (Mahyar Abousaeedi) and he is able to take it eleventh from there. Abousaeedi had a long career with Pixar, as a DOP on Mobil 2, and Ratatouille. One of the main inspirations for lighting in the film is Russell Metty's work on Douglas Sirk films such as Written on the Wind or All that Heaven Possible. Working without Color Script makes Incredibles 2 different types of film production but Ralph Eggleston is not afraid to work differently. We've always made movies better at Pixar, and there's always a point in production where the story falls into place, and with fewer years, it focuses us on finding new ways of working, he says. In the original Incredibles movie, you see city streets and the same six people in the background throughout the entire production, because that's all they can afford to render, he said. In the film, Eggleston knows Pixar has the talent and technology to do so. He filled the room with drawings from artists and each drew men, women and babies, children, all dressed in fifties and sixties wardrobes. When Brad Bird came in for an art review, Eggleston said, I told him that I didn't want you to tell us what you liked. I need you to tell us what you don't like. Of the 500 strange images, he pulled down about eight pictures. Ralph Eggleston hands over the rest to Director of Character Art Matt And they just picked it up and ran. Hats off to the creative to pick it up and and it worked so beautifully, she said. Written by Paul Hellard NARRATOR: Once the basic outline of the story is set, Pixar artists create color scripts, like this one for The Incredibles. The script starts at the top and is read across left to right. It's really just to give, most of the emotional tone of each scene, so you get a sense of not only what the sequence looks like, but what they should feel like too emotionally, just with pure abstract shapes and colors. You know, the way you read sheet music. Production designer Lou Romano spent four years working on The Incredibles. It's a computer-animated movie, and the media can be very realistic. But with this color script I am more concerned with being naked as I can and still convey the most information, and as far as the design angle, almost treat it without rendering, without lighting, just pure color. When I'm working on an actual shot, I'll refer to this. So I always knew what happened before and what happened afterwards, in terms of the continuity of the scene, but also always reminded myself of what these scenes should be on the essence of being naked, without getting caught up in all the details. Details.
