Pope Gregory X with the Mongols[88] may be another reason for this confirmation. At the time, there was open discussion about the possibility of a Christian-Mongul alliance with an anti-Islamic function. [89] In fact, the Mongol delegation was solemnly baptized in the Second Council of Lyon. On the council, Pope Gregory X declared a new Crusade to begin in 1278 in conjunction with the Mongols. [90] The authenticity and correctness of the trial of Kublai Khan, from the French Livre des merveilles Since look at the book with skepticism. [91] Some in the Middle Ages regarded the book only as a romance or fairy tale, due to the sharp differences from its description of advanced civilization in China to other early accounts by Giovanni da Pian del Carpine and William of Rubruck, who described the Mongols as 'barbarians' who seemed to belong to 'several other worlds'. [91] Doubts also arose in the following centuries about Marco Polo's narrative of his travels in China, for example because of his failure to mention the Great Wall of China, and in particular the difficulty in identifying many of the place names he used[92] (a large majority, however, have since been identified). [93] Many have guestioned whether he has visited the places he mentioned in his itinerary.
if he has matched the records of his father and uncle or other travelers, and some doubt if he even reached China, or that if he did, it may never, it has been pointed out that Polo accounts in China were more accurate and detailed than other traveller accounts in that period.
Polo sometimes disputes the 'extraordinary' fairy tales and legends given in other European accounts, and although there are some exaggerates and errors, Polo's account has relatively few descriptions of irrational wonders. In many cases where present (mostly given in the first part before he reaches China, such as mentioning Christian miracles), he makes a clear difference that they are what he has heard rather than what he has seen. It is also largely free of gross errors found in other accounts such as those given by Moroccan traveller Ibn Battuta who has confused the Yellow River with the Grand Canal and other waterways, and believes that porcelain is made of coal. [95] Modern studies have further shown that the details provided in Marco Polo's book, such as the currency used, salt production and income, are accuracy is supported by archaeological evidence as well as Chinese records compiled after Polo left China. Therefore his account is impossible to obtain second hand. [96] Other accounts have also been verified; for example, when visiting Zhenjiang in Jiangsu, China, Marco Polo noted that a large number of Christian churches have been built there. His claim is confirmed by a 14th-century Chinese text explaining how a Sogdian named Mar-Sargis of Samarkand founded six Nestorian Christian churches there in addition to one in Hangzhou during the second half of the 13th century. [97] Her story of Kököchin's daughter being sent from China to Persia to marry Îl-khān was also confirmed by sources in Persia and China. [98] The section's birthplace controversy contains unclear or questionable information relevance to the subject matter of the article. [101][102] The lack of evidence makes curzola/Korčula's theory (perhaps under Ramusio's influence)[103] a particular birthplace highly disputed. [104] An edited scientific paper in

The Seal of the Mongol ruler Ghazan in a 1302 letter to Pope Boniface VIII, with an inscription in the Chinese seal manuscript Explaining the omission of Sceptics has long wondered whether Marco Polo wrote his book based on hearsay, with some pointing to omissions about China's important practices and structures as well as a lack of detail about some of the places in his book. While Polo described banknotes and coal burning, he failed to mention the Great Wall of China, tea, Chinese characters, chopsticks, or footrest. [106] His failure to record the presence of the Great Wall of China was first raised in the mid-eighteenth century, it was suggested that he may have never reached China. [92] Later scholars such as John W. Haeger argued that Marco Polo may not have visited South China due to the lack of detail in his description of the southern Chinese cities compared to the north, while Herbert Franke also raised the possibility that Marco Polo may not have been to China at all, and wondered if he might have based his account on Persian sources because of his use of Persian expressions. [107] This was further taken by Dr. Frances Wood who claimed in her 1995 book Did Marco Polo Go to China? that at first Polo never went further east than Persian books. [108] Wood maintains that it is more likely that polo only went to Constantinople (modern Turkey) and several Italian merchant colonies around the Black Sea, plucking hearsay from travelers who have been further east. [108] Supporters of Polo's basic accuracy countered points raised by skeptics such as footbinding and the Great Wall of China. Historian Stephen G. Haw argues that the Great Wall was built to prevent northern invaders, while the ruling dynasty during Marco Polo's journey; and that the Polo Mongol rulers served controlled territory both north and south of the current wall, and would have no reason to defend a fortress that might have remained from the previous dynasty. [109] Other Europeans who traveled to Khanbaliq during the Yuan dynasty, such as Giovanni de' Marignolli and Odoric of Pordenone, also said nothing about the wall. Muslim traveler Ibn Battuta, who asked about the wall when he visited China during the Yuan dynasty, could not find anyone who had seen it, suggesting that while the ruins of walls built in the previous period may have existed, they were not significant or noteworthy at the time. [109] Haw also argued that footfall was not common even among the Chinese during polo's time and was virtually unknown among the Mongols. While Odoric's Italian missionary from Pordenone who visited Yuan China mentioned footbinding (but it is unclear whether he only conveyed something he heard because his description was inaccurate),[110] no other foreign visitor to the Chinese Yuan mentioned the practice, perhaps an indication that the foothold was not widespread or not practiced in extreme form at the time. [111] Marco Polo himself noted (in toledo's script) the dainty streets of Chinese women who took a very short step. [109] It has also been told by other scholars that many things not mentioned by Marco Polo's account is broader, more accurate and more detailed than other foreign travelers to China in this period. [112] Marco Polo even observed Chinese nautical discoveries such as watertight compartment partitions on Chinese ships, knowledge he wanted to share with fellow Venetians. [113] In addition to Haw, a number of other scholars argued in favor of the well-established view that Polo was in China in response to Wood's book. [114] Wood's book has been criticized by figures including Igor de Rachewiltz (translator and anotor of The Secret History of the Mongols) and Morris Rossabi (author Khan: life and time). [115] Historian David Morgan points out the mistakes made in Wood's book confuse the Liao dynasty with the Jin dynasty, and he finds no hard evidence in the book that will convince him that Marco polo's Chinese book that Marco's account was much more true and accurate than it often should have been and that it was highly unlikely that he could get all the information in his book from secondhand sources. [117] Haw also criticized Wood's approach to finding mention of Marco Polo in Chinese transliteration of Marco's name ignored the possibility of him taking a Chinese or even Mongol name without bearings or similarities with his Latin name. [118] In addition to replying to Wood, Jørgen Jensen recalled meeting Marco Polo and Pietro d'Abano in the late 13th century. In this meeting, Marco gives Pietro details about the astronomical observations he has made on his journey. This observation is compatible only with Marco's stay in China, Sumatra and the South China Sea[119] and is recorded in Pietro Conciliator Differentiarum's book, but not in Marco's Travel Book. Reviewing Haw's book, Peter Jackson (author of The Mongols and the West) says that Haw must now have resolved the controversy surrounding polo's history of visits to China. [120] Igor de Rachewiltz's review, which refuted Wood's point, ended with a strongly worded condemnation: I regret to say that F. W.'s book did not meet the scholarship standards one would expect in a work of this kind. His book can only be described as deceptive, both in relation to the author and to the public at large. Questions posted that, in most cases, have been answered satisfactorily... unprofessional business; he is not well equipped in the basic tools of trade, that is, adequate linguistic competence and research methodology ... and its main argument cannot withstand strict supervision. His conclusion failed to take into account all the evidence that supported Marco Polo exaggerated his interests in China. The English historian David Morgan thought that Polo might have exaggerated and lied about his status in China, [122] while Ronald Latham believed that such exaggeration was ornate by his ghost writer Rustichello da Pisa. [84] Et meser Marco Polo, among which the book relates, ruled the city for three years. — Le divisement dou monde, CXLII, ed. Mario Eusebi, p. 162 This sentence in The Book of Marvels is interpreted as Marco Polo governor of Yangiu Yangzhou. This claim has caused some controversy. According to David Morgan there is no Chinese source who mentions him as a friend of the Emperor or as governor of Yangzhou - indeed no Chinese source mentions Marco Polo at all. [122] In fact, in the 1960s the German historian Herbert Franke noted that all the events of Po-lo or Bolod (the Altaic word meaning steel) in the Yuan text were the names of the Mongols or Turkish extraction, [107] However, in the 2010s the Chinese scholar Peng Hai identified Marco Polo with a certain Boluo, an emperor official, mentioned in yuanshi (History of Yuan) since he was captured in 1274 by an imperial dignified named Saman. The charge is that Boluo had walked on the same side of the road as the female prostitute, contrary to orders for men and women to walk on opposite sides of the road within the city. [123] According to Yuanshi's account, Boluo was released at the emperor's own request, and later transferred to the Ningxia region, in northeastern China today, in the spring of 1275. That date could match the first mission Marco Polo was talking about. [124] If this identification is correct, there is a record of Marco Polo in Chinese sources. These allegations seem to be backed up by the fact that in addition to saman's imperial dignity (the one who had arrested an official named Boluo), the document mentions his brother, Xiangwei. According to sources, Saman died shortly after the incident, while Xiangwei was transferred to Yangzhou in 1282–1283. Marco Polo reported that he was transferred to Hangzhou the following year, in 1284. It has been alleged that this move was due to the intention to avoid further conflict between the two.
[125] Synologist Paul Pelliot thought that Polo might have served as the government's salt monopoly officer in Yangzhou, which is a position of some significance that could explain the exaggeration. [122] It may seem unlikely that Europeans could hold positions of power in the Mongolian empire. However, some records prove he is not the first or only one. In his book, Marco mentions an official named Mar Sarchis who may be the Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian bishop of Nestorian, and he says he founded two Christian bishop of Nestorian bishop of qualified Third Class General. Always in the sheet, said Ma Xuelijsi was an assistant superintendent in Zhenjiang province for three years, and that during this time he founded two Christian churches. [127] In fact, it is a well-documented fact that Kublai Khan trusts foreigners more than chinese subjects in internal affairs.
[128] Stephen G. Haw challenged the idea that Polo its own interests, itself, that, contrary to what is often said ... Marco did not claim a highly annihilated position for himself in the Yuan empire. [129] He pointed out that Polo never claimed to hold a high rank, as darughachi, who led the tumen - a typically 10,000-strong unit. In fact, Polo doesn't even imply that he has led 1,000 personnel. Haw points out that Polo himself seems to have simply stated that he has become khan's messenger, in a position with some self-esteem. According to Haw, this is a reasonable claim if Polo was, for example, a keshig - a member of the imperial guard of the same name, which included as many as 14,000 individuals at the time. [129] Haw explained how the earliest manuscripts of Polo's account provided conflicting information about his role in Yangzhou, with some claiming he was only a modest resident, others claiming he was a governor, and Ramusio's text claiming he only held the office as a temporary replacement for others, but all the texts agreed that he worked as an honorable envoy for khan. [130] Haw also objected to the approach of finding a mention of Marco Polo in Chinese texts, arguing that contemporary Europeans paid little attention to the use of surnames, and the direct Chinese transcription of Marco's name ignored the possibility of him taking a Chinese or even Mongol name that had no bearing or similarity to his Latin name. [129] Another controversial claim is in chapter 145 when the Book of Marvels states that the three Poloss gave the Mongols technical advice on building mangonel during the Siege of Xiangyang, Adonc distrent les .II. freres et lor filz meser Marc. Grant Sire, nos avon avech nos en nostre mesnie homes qe firont tielz mangan qe giteront si grant pieres qe celes de la cité ne poront sofrir mes se renderont maintenant. Then the brothers and their son Marc said: Oh my God, in our company, we have people who will build mangonels like that that launch such boulders, that the townswellers will not bear it and will soon give up. - Le devisement dou monde, CXLV, ed. Mario Eusebi, p. 163 Since the siege was completed in 1273, before Marco Polo arrived in China for the first time, the claim cannot be true[122][131] The Mongol army that besieged Xiangyang did have foreign military engineers, but they are mentioned in Chinese sources as being from Baghdad and having Arabic names. [107] In this case, Igor de Rachewiltz cautioned that the claim that the three Polo were present at the Siege of Xiang-was not present in all the texts, but Niccolò and Matteo could have made this suggestion. Therefore, this claim seems to be the next addition to give more credibility to the story. [133] A number of errors in Marco Polo's account have noted: for example, he described the bridge that came to be known as the Marco Polo Bridge as having the arch is not eleven or thirteen. [39] He also said that khanbaliq city walls have twelve gates when they have mixed up details of two attempts at a Japanese invasion by Kublai Khan in 1274 and 1281. Polo wrote about the five masted ships, when archaeological excavations discovered that the ships, in fact, had only three masts. [135] Appropriation Wood accuses Marco Polo of taking other people's accounts in his book, reteling other stories as his own, or basing his account on Persian guidebooks or other lost sources. For example, The Sinologist Francis Woodman Cleaves notes that Polo's account of Kököchin's daughter's voyage from China to Persia to marry Il-khān in 1293 was confirmed by a passage in the 15th-century Chinese work Yongle Encyclopedia and by the Persian historian Rashid-al-Din, however, none of these accounts mention Polo or indeed Europeans as part of the bridal party,[98] and Wood uses the lack of mention of Polo in these works as an example of retelring Polo's famous story. Morgan, in Polo's defence, noted that even the princess herself was not mentioned in Chinese sources and that it would have been surprising if Polo had been mentioned by Rashid-al-Din. [116] Historian Igor de Rachewiltz strongly criticized Wood's arguments in his review of his book. [136] Rachewiltz argued that Marco Polo's account, in fact, allowed Persian and Chinese sources to be reconciled – by relaying information that two of the three messengers sent (mentioned in Chinese sources and whose names corresponded to those given by Polo) had died during the voyage, that explains why only the third survivor, Coja/Khoja, was mentioned by Rashid al-Din. Polo has therefore completed the story by providing information not found in any of the sources. He also noted that the only Persian source to mention the princess was not completed until 1310-11, therefore Marco Polo could not learn information from any Persian book. According to de Rachewiltz, Polo's detailed account of the princess with other independent sources who provided only incomplete information is proof of the veracity of Polo's story and his presence in China. [136] Morgan's assessment writes that since much of what The Book of Marvels says about China is proven correct, any claim that Polo did not go to China creates far more problems than is solved, therefore the balance of probabilities strongly indicates that Polo actually went to China, even if he exaggerated rather importantly in China. [137] Haw dismissed criticism against Polo accounts that began in the 17th century, and highlights polo accounts, for example in ground laying such as Chinese canal. [138] If Marco were a liar, wrote Haw, then he would have been meticulous.
[139] In 2012, University of Tübingen Sinologist and historian Hans Ulrich Vogel released a detailed analysis of Polo's currency, salt production and income descriptions, and argued that the evidence supported his presence in China because he included details he could not know. [140] Vogel noted that no other Western,
Arabic, or Persian source provided accurate and unique details about the Chinese currency, e.g., paper shape and size, the use of seals, various banknote denominations as well as variations in currency use in different regions of China, such as the use of cow shells in Yunnan, details supported by archaeological evidence and Chinese sources compiled long after leaving Plain China. [141] His account of salt production and revenue from salt monopolies is also accurate, and corresponds to Chinese documents of the Yuan era. [142] Economic historian Mark Elvin, in his foreword to the 2013 Vogel monograph, concluded that Vogel showed a particular example after a specific example of the eventually remarkable probability of the widespread authenticity of Polo's account. Many of the problems were caused by the oral transmission of the original text and the proliferation of significantly different hand-copied manuscripts. For example, whether Polo exerts political authority (seignora) in Yangzhou or just sojourn (sejourna) there. Elvin concludes that those who doubt, albeit erroneously, are not always being casual or stupid, but the case as a whole has now been closed: the book is, in effect, authority (seignora) in Yangzhou or just sojourn (sejourna) there. Pasta myth There is a legend about Marco Polo importing pasta from China; However, it is actually a popular misconception, [147] derived from the Macaroni Journal, published by a food industry association with the aim of promoting pasta use in the United States. [148] Marco Polo describes in his book a food similar to lasagna, but he uses a term he already knows. In fact, pasta had been found in Italy long before Marco Polo's trip to Asia. [149] According to the bulletins of the National

pp. 5-6; it has not been determined where (or exactly when) Traveler was born. His birth was not recorded on the Venetian birth list (and not only that; the first document connecting Venice and his family was the same evidence of his uncle Marco made vr. 1280), and Korčula's birth list began to take much after his birth (only from 1583 tyr.). But Italian historiography assumes that he was born in Venice and calls for the alleged grandfather of Marco's father - Andrea Polo of San Felice (who, as we say, was first mentioned was by G.B. Ramusio), while our history claims the birthplace of Korčula. Italian historians often, due to the lack of archives of Marco Polo's birth in Venice, emphasize that of course he was born in the Republic of Venice since Dalmatia then in his compositions. A Puljiz-Šostik 2015, p. 2015. Bergreen 2007, p. 24.
