Unfortunately, faulty reasoning often mis-guides our research. Take, for example, restaurant giants McDonald's (NYSE:MCD) and Domino's Pizza (NYSE:DPZ). McDonald's shares are about 7% lower than this time last year. By contrast, Domino's shares have climbed nearly 60% over the same time period. Given the choice, many investors would decide to buy McDonald's shares at a discount rather than chase Domino's shares at all-time highs. This is looking for a value in the wrong places. Let's take a closer look at why McDonald's shares might not beat the market in the coming years. We can also see why Domino's shares continue to value for investors despite their big drop. Image Source: Getty Images. A limited advantage for McDonald's comparable sales, or same-store sales, are an important metric for measuring sales trends. But companies define the term differently. For McDonald's, it adds restaurant locations to its comparable store base after they have been operating for 13 months. New stores could take time to increase, or sales could be temporarily inflated due to excitement. Comparable sales are therefore a more stable metric for measuring sales trends. McDonald's overall comparable sales rose 5.3%, 4.5%, and 5.9% in 2017, 2018 and 2019 respectively, a strong trend for the world's largest restaurant chain. However, the company's revenue fell 14% during that period. In fact, average earnings behind 12 months came in 2014 and has steadily declined since then. McD Revenue (TTM) YCharts Revenue is declining for McDonald's because it has taken thousands of restaurants owned by the company and rejected them. With business-owned locations, restaurant sales are counted as revenue. With franchised locations, only franchise fees count. McDonald's comparable growth shows that it remains a relevant company among consumers. However, through the refranquing of locations, much of this setback remains Franchisees. In addition, limiting its revenue upwards, McDonald's is struggling to grow its bottom line. Net income was essentially flat from 2018 to 2019 as the unique benefits of refranquism moved to the rearview mirror. I don't suggest McDonald's is doomed. Quite the opposite. Your comparable growth in sales shows that your business is fine. And the company will continue modest growth in earnings per share by repurchasing its shares, and will continue to reward shareholders with its dividend, which currently yield 2.4%. But this recipe does not look like it will produce results that will beat the market in the long run. Image Source: Getty Images. Don't sleep on the potential domino Domino's is largely franchised as McDonald's. But compensate for this limiting feature by opening new locations. In fact, another reason to question McDonald's ability to beat the market forward is its minimum expansion opportunity. It is already the world's largest restaurant chain, limiting how much more it can grow. By contrast, Domino's is still planning for huge growth. By 2025, Domino aspires to have 25,000 locations worldwide and $25 billion of global retail sales. By prospect, the company now has about 17,000 locations and had retail sales of $14.6 billion in 2019. It is therefore counting on finding market opportunities for 6,000 more restaurants and location sales are expected to increase. Domino's growth plan should be taken very seriously, given its million-dollar results over the past decade. And there is another reason to buy into management's vision: the company is running very well during the coronavirus pandemic. In the second quarter, Domino's comparable sales in the U.S. grew 16% year-on-year over the year, its 37th consecutive quarter of positive U.S. comparable sales growth. While no one is encouraging the negative effects of the coronavirus pandemic, tension in independent restaurants must be acknowledged. According to the Independent Restaurant Coalition, 85% of independent restaurants run the risk of closing their doors for good - they need financial help. One would assume that pizzeria restaurants are included in this chilling projection. After all, few standalone pizza operations are equipped with digital ordering technology and a network of delivery drivers like Domino's. That means Domino's could be in a prime position to steal more market share in the U.S., with both increased restaurant sales and new restaurant location opportunities. In other words, the management growth plan is not only achievable, but could accelerate in the short term. This will grow the The graph below five years below shows what happens when Domino's grows revenue. DPZ profit margin data from YCharts Domino's profit margin increase with higher sales. A higher profit margin translates into more net income - it recorded $400 million in 2019. With its benefits, Domino's shareholders by reducing their share count and growing their dividend. In the end, the shareholder value that beats in the market is created. It is a trend that should continue as Domino's grows its maximum line between now and 2025. Despite trading near all-time highs, Domino's shares are still a good buy and a better buy than McDonald's shares today. Hey, guys!!! Today we will make the perfect homemade pizza sauce... So, we startFirst ingredients:TomatoesCarrotsPeppers (green, red, orange whatever color you want :D)CebaFresh herbs (parsley, basil or oregano, for example) or some fed herbs (if you don't have fresh)Pinch of sugar salPinchPinch pepperGarlic (optional) This is an older video and a re-filming plan very soon That's how I make my pizza sauce!! Accommodation instructions: In medium heat sauce 2T Butter and 2 T Olive oil over medium heat. When the oil is hot add 1 chopped shallot, 4 grains of garlic, and cook until smooth. After the shallots and garlic are soft add 1 T. dry Italian seasoning and leave to cook for a minute to infuse the oil. Then add 1 16oz. can crushed tomatoes and 1 8 oz of tomato sauce. Salt and pepper can be added to taste. I've also added some sugar to get the pasta out of the tomato. Let the sauce simmer for 5 minutes, then you're ready to put on your pizza or even spaghetti!!! It takes little laugh to get most people to order a pizza. You never lose, do you? Even a good pizza is a solid meal. However, if you're somehow looking for an excuse to order a pizza, Domino's has put a deal together that bridges National Cheese lover's Day (January 20) to National Cake Day (January 23) and even a few days later. From January 20 to 26, Domino's has a week-long offer that will land you a large two-topping pizza for just $5.99. The offer is available for telephone, in-store, mobile or web orders. However, it is not available for delivery. You're going to have to. This new discount is available in addition to the Domino's Mix & Mix menu. Match, where you can order either item and get one for only $5.99. Options include an average two-topping pizza (represented somewhat useless by the grand previous pizza offering), bread twists, salad, brownie marbled biscuit, specialty chicken, baked sandwich, stuffed cheese bread, eight-piece boneless chicken, or pasta. The choice is yours, but you'll definitely be able to get full on $5.99 this week.
