Initial historical information about the sheriff's office dates back to 1902, when law enforcement for the county consisted of a sheriff and one deputy. Their office was a room in the old court. In 1939, Buchanan County built an existing courthouse where the sheriff, his deputies and clerks had small one-room offices. Over time, the number of surrogates increased to catch up with the need to fight crime. In 1976, the sheriff's office moved to an independent public safety center north of the courthouse. In July 2010, the Buchanan County Sheriff's Office started operations on a new building built south of the Buchanan County Courthouse. The new building includes a sheriff's office, a communications center, and a correctional center (prison). The Buchanan County Sheriff's Office provides police protection and enforces local, state, and federal laws for 11 integrated communities and all rural Buchanan counties. The communities are Aurora, Brandon, Hazelton, Lamont, Quasketon, Raleigh, Stanley and Winthrop. The three remaining towns of Fairbanks, Independence and Jessup have their own city law enforcement agencies.
