A new case identified Tuesday morning has raised concerns because of their extensive travel history. (Bloomberg Opinion) - Like the little boy haunted by ghosts in the horror movie The Sixth Sense, President Donald Trump sees dead people everywhere. He thinks at least 5,000 of them voted in Georgia during the presidential election and were part of a broader conspiracy that robbed him of a victory in the state. In an unhinged, extraordinary phone call Saturday with Georgia Secretary of State Brad Raffensperger, a Republican, and Ryan Germany, Raffensperger's general counsel, Trump tried to strong-arm them in admitting that President-elect Joe Biden hadn't really secured 11,779 more votes than he did. And he encouraged them to find ways to invalidate those votes, according to a recording of the conversation provided by the Washington Post (which broke the story) and Bloomberg News. So what are we going to do here, folks? Trump asked during the hour-long conversation. I only need 11,000 votes. Guys. I need 11.000 votes. Trump, who oversees the Justice Department for 16 more days, also threatened both men and warned that they could be indicted on felony charges if they did not support his voter fraud charges. The phone call commemorated what corruption and a desire to orchestrate a political coup sound like and. thankfully, Raffensperger and Germany were unmoved. The challenge you have is the data you have is wrong, Raffensperger told Trump, who kept trying to steam him anyway. What we're seeing is not what you're describing at all, Germany said. Trump has been at it for decades, so there's nothing surprising about this. He spent years trying to bully, buy off or corrupt regulators, politicians, law enforcement officials and others he encountered as a developer, casino operator, media fixture and politicians, law enforcement officials and others he encountered as a developer, casino operator, media fixture and politicians, law enforcement officials and others he encountered as a developer, casino operator, media fixture and politicians. He was indicted for trying to convince the Ukrainian president during a phone call to find dirt on Biden that would undermine his presidential candidacy. But it's surprising how easily Trump continues to corrupt so many around him. Too few in his party are willing to tell the president, as Germany did, that reality does not comport with his lies. Cowed by Trump's political traction or eager to jump on his gravy train, too few are willing to leave him publicly so that voters' faith in the electoral process, democracy and the rule of law is not permanently undercut. Instead, we're treated to some of Trump's more cartoonish and dangerous enablers coming to the fore. His chief of staff, Mark Meadows, encouraged Georgia officials on the call to be more complete election results and - in the spirit of cooperation - to find a path forward outside the justice system (which has already roundly rejected Trump's fraud claims). On Saturday night, Meadows took to Twitter to encouragement Congress to object to the certification of the presidential elections on January 6. It's time to fight back, he advised. Last week, Senator Josh Hawley, a Missouri Republican, said he planned to object to certification, citing Pennsylvania's results specifically. Eleven other incumbent and incoming Republican senators, including Ted Cruz, have since said they will join Hawley. This is performance art for an audience in the Oval Office and in the house of senators states. It won't stop Biden from becoming president, but it further anchors Trumpism as an operational principle in the GOP and in the federal government. Seven Republicans in the House of Representatives have broken with their party and said any attempt to reject the voters of states is unconstitutional. A handful in the Senate, including Mitch McConnell, Mitt Romney, Lisa Murkowski and Pat Toomey, have said much the same. I may miss a few other like-minded souls, but only a small proportion of the 249 Republicans in Congress have spoken out. Imagine how the GOP would have reacted if Barack Obama tried to corrupt a secretary of state to overturn election results, and reflect on the radio silence enveloping the party now. Even if Trump managed to overturn Georgia's results, it would not provide the electoral votes he needs to overcome Biden. He is certainly aware of this, but he is so inexhaustible – and if unable to come to terms with losses – that he is willing to try to set democracy on fire to calm himself down. He also called for rallies that could turn into riots in Washington on Wednesday. How all that will unfold will, in part, speak to the future of the institutions, processes and voters Trump has spent so much time poisoning. An administration that began in the shadow of an Access Hollywood tape is winding down in the shadow of an Access Georgia tape. While it's possible that Trump committed a crime by trying to interfere in federal and state elections in the phone call, there may not be enough time or evidence to do anything about the lack of support he felt he was getting from the governor of Georgia. But that's the way it is now. That's the way it is now and then. Indeed. (Corrects the number of votes to 11,779 in the 2nd paragraph.) (Bloomberg) - Investors want to see more pieces of geopolitical puzzle of the Middle East fall into place before they put bonds in the de a new elevator. The annual meeting of the Gulf Cooperation Council in Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, Bahrain and Egypt on the other. Saudi Arabia said it will open its land, air and sea borders with Qatar on Monday night ahead of the meeting, dramatically easing the years-long diplomatic rift. Still, the market impact of a full recovery in ties may be muted as investors focus on bigger concerns, including U.S. President-elect Joe Biden's stance on key allies in the region, and escalating tensions between Washington and Tehran. Any move toward repairing the impasse would be only marginally positive for the region's debt markets, said Mohieddine Kronfol, Dubai-based chief investment officer for the Middle East and North African fixed income at Franklin Templeton. While this is clearly welcome news to see a rapprochement of some types between GCC members, this is perhaps one of the less impactful geopolitical pressures facing the region, he said in an interview with Bloomberg Television. This will take time to convince the market that confidence has been rebuilt. Here's how investors are looking at a possible easing in the Oatar rift: Abdul Kadir Hussain, Dubai-based head of fixed income asset management at Argaam Capital If the Qatar issue gets a solution it would just raise the feel-good factor. Other than that, I don't expect much Any agreement toward restoring relations can fuel a slight bounce in GCC bonds if you don't have the rapprochement and you get more rhetoric against Iran then you might get a small drop in price. Glancy Prongay & End Citizens (QS) on behalf of Investors Washington, DC, January 4, 2021 (GLOBE NEWSWIRE) -- End Citizens United//Let America Vote Action Fund President Tiffany Muller has released the following statement on the reintroduction of H.R. 1 as for the People Act. The reappointment to anti-corruption and voting rights reforms as a top priority: In November, tens of millions of Americans used their vote to demand a solution to a rigged political system that prioritizes special interests and businesses over individuals. With today's reintroduction of H.R. 1, the For the People Act, House Democrats are taking that call on hold. This transformative, far-reaching measure will help root out corruption, end the dominance of great special interests, reform our voting systems, and give the American people their vote back. It will restore the promise of our democracy and make government work better for all Americans. We applaud Speaker Pelosi, Leader Hoyer, Chairman Lofgren and Bill Author Congressman John Sarbanes for making this the top priority of the new Congress and welcome the rapid passage. Sen. Cory Booker (D-N.J.) and End Citizens United and Let America Vote Action Fund President Tiffany Muller recently wrote an opinion on Congress to pass the For the People Act to protect our elections and protect the right to vote. (Bloomberg) - Oil extended losses after OPEC+ talks were unexpectedly suspended amid a disagreement over whether to increase production in February. Futures in New York fell to $47 a barrel after slumping 1.9% on Monday. Talks will resume on Tuesday after a majority of members, including Saudi Arabia, opposed Russia's proposal for an increase in supply in February. The rift between Riyadh and Moscow evokes memories of last year's crippling price war. The production negotiations are happening against a grim short-term demand backdrop as Covid-19 continues to spread and leads to more stay-at-home orders and travel restrictions. England was ordered into a third lockdown until mid-February, Germany is poised to extend stricter measures beyond 10 Jan, while Japan is considering another emergency for the Tokyo region. The U.S. crude benchmark had risen to nearly $50 a barrel earlier on Monday, helped by a weak dollar. The early stages of the rollout of Covid-19 vaccines have fueled optimism that energy demand will recover quickly as the global economy rebounds, and oil has emerged as a favorite trade to hedge inflation. But with so many curbs on mobility still on the horizon, demand prospects for gasoline and diesel will get worse before it gets better, according to Amrita Sen, co-founder of consultant Energy Aspects Ltd. in London. Consumer data for the first half of this year will be negatively affected by the pandemic, Sen said in an interview on Bloomberg Television. Iran, meanwhile, seized a South Korean-flagged oil tanker in the Strait of Hormuz hours before announcing that it would increase its nuclear activities, the latest in a series of naval incidents in the Persian Gulf.
