Riddle school transfer guide

Are you moving to high school or will you move soon? Are you wondering how this will affect high school transcripts, when you graduate, and how schools view your college questions? Then this guide is for you! Read on to learn how to transfer high school, what it means for your future, and the steps you can take to make this process as smooth and simple as possible. What does it mean to move high schools? How do I start the process? When someone says they're moving schools, what does it actually mean? When you move to high school, it means you don't sign up for one high school and sign up for another. This does not include the middle school diploma and therefore the beginning of high school, which is a regular academic progression and not classified as a transfer. The transfer is usually made during the summer, but can also take place during the school year. Different schools and states have different processes for transfer, and the amount of work you need to do may vary depending on whether you stay in the same school district or move to a whole new one. Your parents and people in your old and new schools will likely help guide you through the transfer process, but it typically starts with submitting a question to the school you'd like to attend. If you are under the age of 18, you will need your parent/guardian to submit your transfer request. Transfer applications typically require certain identifying information, residency evidence, medical forms, and transcripts from your current high school. If you request a transfer because you are moving or because of a serious issue, such as bullying, it will probably be accepted, but not all transfer requests are approved. Typically, it's easier to transfer schools if you're an underclassman than a higher class. What happens after I get approval for the transfer? The transfer does not take place immediately and it is often necessary to apply a few weeks or months before you want to change schools. You will be required to attend your current school until your transfer request is approved and you start at your new school. Once you've been approved to attend a new school, you can take placement tests so you're placed in the classes that best suit you. Sooner or later when you start classes in your new school, you'll meet an academic advisor who will help you plan your schedule for you. Many schools have informal meetings for new students to help transfer students to meet new people and learn more about the school. As soon as your application is approved in your new school, you are student to all effects there and you can join or try for different sports and clubs. It is highly recommended to do this since participating in extracurriculars is a great way to meet new people and feel more connected your new school. Why do people move to high school? What causes students to move to a new high school? Below are the three most common reasons for moving high schools. Reason #1: They move to a new area This is, by far, the most common reason people move to high school. When your parents move to a different place, you often can't continue studying in your current school. This can be a movement through the country, or simply a transfer to the neighboring city. Because moving out of the area can make it impossible to attend your current school and it's something high school students don't have much control over, these transfer requests are basically always approved. If the move is sudden, many schools can make accommodations so that they can start attending classes right away (thankfully!); however, it is better to start this process in advance if you know that you will move in the future. Reason #2: They find a particular school that they want to attend Sometimes, you don't move, but you find a new high school that you prefer to the current one and want to move to it. The new school may have better academics, extracurriculars or an alternative teaching method of your choice. You may also have been accepted into a selective high school where you had to apply for admission. Be aware that if you're looking to move from one school in your district to another, your district may have certain policies as to why they're acceptable for the transfer. The transfer request may not always be approved. Reason #3: They don't like their current school In other cases, you don't want to move to go to a big school you've already chosen, you simply don't want to attend your current school anymore. This can happen if a student feels bullied, has had trouble making friends, or doesn't learn well from the school's teaching style. On rare occasions, a student may also be forced to leave a school for disciplinary reasons. Common questions that students have when transferring high schools Once the transfer request is approved, that doesn't mean all the work is done! The transfer can cause some wrinkles in high school plans, but if you're aware of the potential challenges and start planning ahead how to deal with them, you'll minimize unpleasant surprises and frustrations along the way. Below are three of the most common questions on how to transfer high schools, and for each one, advice is given on how to minimize problems. Question 1: All my old credits you in my new school? If you're moving from one public school to another within the same state, you'll probably have no problem with that. However, if you move to a new state or move from a public school to a private school (or vice versa), not all of your credits could be transferred. In most cases, all or most of your classes will transfer well, well, occasionally your new school will not accept credit for one or more of your classes. This is typically because these classes do not meet certain requirements of the new school, such as coverage of certain topics, meeting for the required number of hours, or including certain exams. If this happens to you, your new school won't give you credit for that class, it won't appear on your new transcript, and it will appear (at your new school) as if you've never taken that lesson. If enough lessons don't move, this could cause a graduation date delay because you'll need to take extra lessons to make up for credits that haven't been transferred. How to minimize issues This can be a frustrating situation because you're not getting credit for the lessons you've taken and passed. However, this isn't a problem for most students, and even if it is, you'll probably have enough other credits you won't need to take summer classes or delay graduation. Talk to your new academic advisor right after starting your new school to find out if one of your old credits hasn't moved in and, if so, how that will affect you. If you think you have credit for a certain class, discuss that your advisor will. Schools can often be flexible about which classes they accept. Question 2: Will my GPA remain the same? Many high school students are understandably concerned about what happens to their GPA when they change schools. Will they keep their current GPA? Will it be completely canceled when they start in a new school? The short answer is that it depends on your new school; each school has its own policy for the way it manages the GPAs of transferring students. However, in most cases one of two things will happen: either you keep your current GPA and it will only change when you get new grades in your new school, or your new school will recalculate your current GPA so that it fits their ranking models. For example, if your old school has given advantages and disadvantages on transcription, but your new school doesn't, your new school could recalculate your GPA without those advantages and disadvantages so that it matches the GPA rating models of the rest of the students. Even if that happens, it probably won't change your GPA significantly, so try not to worry too much. How to minimize issues The best thing to do here is to talk to your new guidance consultant and find out if and how your GPA will be affected by the transfer. Do it as soon as possible so that everyone is on the same page and you are not surprised in a semester where the votes come out and your that's not what you expected. Question 3: Will high school transfer affect my university applications? Students are sometimes concerned that moving schools and having two transcripts will negatively affect their university applications. The good news is that, on its own, the transfer of high school negative impact on university applications. Colleges understand that school transfer is a common event, and many times the student doesn't have control over whether it happens (for example, if your parents decide to move). You'll typically have to send transcripts from each of the high schools you've attended, but again, colleges are used to this and will be fine with it. The only time the high school transfer will have a negative impact on your college applications is if your grades have dropped significantly or you have moved for behavioral or disciplinary reasons. How to minimize problems In most cases, moving high schools won't give you anything to worry about when applying for college. However, if your grades dropped long before and/or after your transfer, or you were expelled or had similar serious disciplinary issues, colleges might be wary of accepting you. The best way to combat it is to be open about it and explain it. You can do this in your personal statement or many schools have a space in their questions for students to tell the additional information they would like the school to have. When you explain, be honest about what happened and give yourself specific examples of how you've improved since then. Question 4: What new graduation requirements do I need to meet? You may find that your new school has different graduation requirements than your previous school. This is especially likely to happen if your new high school is in a different state since high school graduation requirements are often determined by the state. Sometimes meeting these new graduation requirements means that your schedule seems a bit odd. For example, I went to high school in Illinois, and every person graduating from high school in Illinois has to take a driver's education course (the driving part is not necessary if you're not going to get a driver's license). In my class there were two 18-year-old boys who had moved here from another state that didn't require the driver. As a result, these students, who had had their licenses and had been driving for two years, were stuck taking a basic driving course. How to minimize problems again, talk to your academic advisor right away to find out what your new school's graduation requirements are. Work with your advisor to plan your lesson schedule for each semester until you graduate. If you need to take extra lessons, see if you can take them during the summer so you can graduate on time. You may also be able to meet certain requirements, such as health or typing, by taking online lesson. Understanding it soon will help you stay on track and avoid surprises when it comes time to graduate. Stay aware of your graduation requirements so you can graduate on time like this guy. Conclusion High school transfer may seem stressful and challenging, but it doesn't have to be! Once the application has been approved, start researching how the transfer will affect different academic areas such as transcription, course credits, and graduation requirements. At first, work with your counselor and teachers at your new school to develop lesson times, so you know what lessons you need to take and when you'll graduate. If you're prepared and know what to expect, transferring high school is likely to be a smooth process. What's the next step?
