Before we start talking about tools to help you find your loved ones, ask for quick clarity that you need important information to identify in hand in order to do so. This information includes: the full name of your loved ones (middle name and last name), their date of birth, the status they were held inNote. Whether certain tools may be recommended or require more information from you about a loved one depends on the individual's circumstances, when we pass this list, we will make it clear what this information is and is available. Now for the inmate placement tool. As we mentioned, bop search engines only show results for federal inmates. To find inmates who are detained in local or state prisons, you will need a government website. State prisons may vary in their processes. The general process of finding a loved one can be seen with some examples: Here's what you need if your loved one is imprisoned in New York: Note that the department's identification number or New York State identification number is for use with them. In other words, if you include these figures, you do not need to enter the inmate's name and birth year. Similarly, to search for inmates in California, you'll need to enter their full legal name or inmate number if you know: While most states provide the ability to search for inmates on their official government websites, others are not. Use a third-party search engine, which we will discuss in the next section. The Bureau of Prisons allows you to search the database of federal inmates to search for loved ones and disclose their contact information. Please note that this database is only available to inmates held in federal prisons. The BOP database also includes information about inmates released dating back to 1982. First of all, let's find inmates using their names: again, search for common names without any additional information, leading to many search results. Also, please note that search engines are limited. The number of results is 100 - meaning other inmates with the name John Smith do not appear. Obviously, it's unlikely to face this problem, but it's good to know at any rate you can also narrow your search by including race, age and gender of your loved ones, since this search engine doesn't have advanced search features, you may need to include this information to see fewer than 100 results.
