Learn Religions / Kelly Miller The Greeks proposed the existence of five basic elements. Of these, four were the physical elements—fire, air, water, and earth—of which the whole world is composed. Alchemists eventually associate four triangular symbols to represent these elements. The fifth element, which goes by a variety of names, is rarer than the four physical elements. Some call it Spirit. Others call it ether or quintessence (literally the fifth element in Latin). In traditional Western hidden theory, the elements are hierarchical: Spirit, fire, air, water and earth, being the first most spiritual and perfect elements and the last most material and basic elements. Some modern systems, such as Wicca, see the elements as equals. Before examining the elements themselves, it is important to understand the qualities, orientations, and correspondences associated with the elements. Each element is connected to aspects in each of these, and helps correlate its relationship with each other. Catherine Beyer In classical elementary systems, each element has two qualities, and shares each quality with another element. Each element is warm or cold, and this corresponds to a male or female gender. This is a strongly dichotomous system, where male qualities are things like light, heat and activity, and female qualities are dark, cold, passive and receptive. The orientation of the triangle is determined by heat or coldness, male or female. The masculine and warm elements point upwards, ascending into the spiritual realm. The female cold elements point downwards, descending to earth. The second pair of qualities is moisture or dryness. Unlike warm and cold qualities, wet and dry qualities do not immediately correspond to other concepts. Because each element shares one of its qualities with another element, that leaves an element completely unrelated. For example air is humid as water and hot as fire, but has nothing in common with the earth. These opposite elements are on opposite sides of the diagram and are distinguished by the presence or absence of the crossbar within the triangle: Air Air land are opposites and have the crossbarWater and fire are also opposites and lack the crossbar. Traditionally there is a hierarchy of elements, although some modern schools of thought have abandoned this system. The lower elements of the hierarchy are more material and physical, with the upper elements increasingly spiritual, rarer and less physical. That hierarchy can be traced through this diagram. Earth is the lowest, most material element. Clockwise from the ground you get water, and then air and then fire, which is the least material of the elements. Catherine Beyer The staff has represented many different meanings over the centuries. Since at least the Renaissance, one of its associations has been with the five elements. Traditionally, there is a hierarchy between the elements ranging from the most spiritual and rare to the less spiritual and the most material. This hierarchy determines the placement of elements around the staff. Starting with the spirit, the highest element, we descend into the fire, then follow the staff lines into the air, through the water, and to the ground, the lowest and most material of the elements. The final line between the earth and the spirit completes the geometric shape. The question of a staff pointing upwards or aiming only gained relevance in the 19th century and has everything to do with the arrangement of the elements. A pointing staff came to symbolize the spirit that ruled over the four physical elements, while a staves pointed down symbolized that the spirit was subsumed by matter or descended into matter. Since then, some have simplified these associations to represent good and evil. This is usually not the position of those who commonly work with staves pointing down, and it is often not the position of those who associate with staves pointing upwards either. The colors used here are those associated with each element by the Golden Dawn. These associations are commonly provided by other groups as well. Hidden Catherine Noble Beyer Ceremonial systems traditionally rely on correspondence systems: collections of articles that are all somehow associated with the desired purpose. While the types of correspondences are almost endless, the associations between elements, seasons, time of day, elements, lunar phases, and directions have become quite standardized in the West. These are often the basis for additional correspondences. The Hermetic Order of Golden Dawn codified some of these correspondences in the 19th century. The most notable here are the cardinal directions. The Golden Dawn originated in England, and the correspondences reflect a European perspective. To the south are the warmer climates, and therefore it is associated with fire. The Atlantic Ocean is to the west. The north is cold and formidable, a land of the earth, but sometimes not much else. Occultists who practice in or elsewhere sometimes they don't find these correspondences to work with. Cycles are important facets of many hidden systems. Looking at the daily, monthly and annual natural cycles, we find periods of growth and death, fullness and sterility. Fire is the element of fullness and life, and is closely associated with the Sun. Therefore, it is not surprising that noon and summer are associated with fire. By that same logic, the full moon should also be in the same category. The Earth is in the opposite direction as fire and therefore corresponds to midnight, winter and the new moon. While these things may represent sterility, they are most often representative of potential and transformation; the point where the old man gives way to the new; empty fertility is preparing to fuel new creations. Air is the element of new beginnings, youth, augmentation and creativity. As such, it is associated with spring, waxed moon, and sunrise. Things are getting warmer and brighter, while plants and animals give birth to a new generation. Water is the element of emotion and wisdom, particularly the wisdom of age. It represents a time beyond the peak of sustenance, moving towards the end of the cycle. Fire is associated with strength, activity, blood and life force. It is also seen as highly purifying and protective, consuming impurities and returning darkness. Fire is traditionally seen as the rarest and most spiritual of physical elements due to its masculine properties (which were superior to female properties). It also lacks physical existence, produces light and has transformative power when it comes into contact with more physical material. Water is one of two who have a physical existence that can interact with all physical senses. Water is still considered less material (and therefore higher) than earth because it possesses more movement and than the earth. Several systems can associate planets, tools, etc., but such correspondences are much less standardized than those of the other four elements. The element of the spirit goes by several names. The most common are spirit, ether or ether, and quintessence, which is Latin for the fifth element. There is also no standard symbol for the spirit, although circles are common. Eight-spoke wheels and spirals are also sometimes used to represent the spirit. The spirit is a bridge between the physical and the spiritual. In cosmological models, the spirit is the transient material between the physical and celestial realms. Within the microcosmos, the spirit is the bridge between body and soul.
