Since the number of sheets on a roll of toilet paper can vary significantly from the brands, we recommend that you check the number of square feet of packaging to compare the cost. You should also understand that you are likely to use fewer sheets with a multi-layered roll than one layer. Published time: August 27, 2015 06:00 06:00 06 The truth is that for years, toilet paper manufacturers have been selling less product and masking contraction with hyperbole and hard-to-quantify claims. According to John T. Gourville, a marketing professor at Harvard Business School, they get away with it because consumers have a better understanding of how much a product costs than they should be. They have in their minds that this toilet paper costs 79 cents and it costs 89 cents, he explains. They don't take into account that one has fewer pages. When one company reduces its products, others follow to avoid appearing more expensive. Angel Soft's maker brags that its double roll has 60 percent more leaves than the Charmin Ultra double roll. However, these brands have many sizes and the counting of pages is not how to determine a value – factors are also the size and thickness of the sheet. Consumer Reports contacted a customer service representative to find out what was behind all the contractions and received various explanations. Many suggested that their products have become so good that consumers actually need it less. Customer rep Kimberly-Clark, maker of Cottonelle and Scott, told us that the cut was a marketing decision in response to the rising costs of production and marketing. A follow-up statement said that product innovations provided better, stronger tissue, so you need fewer pages to get the job done. Procter & Gamble's customer representative told us that the reduction in the number of pages allowed the company to improve the quality of its flagship Charmin TP. The newer version is more flexible than the previous ones, the rep said, and consumers should need a lot less. Costco's decision to cut its Kirkland Signature multipacks from 36 to 30 rolls was also explained as a less-is-more approach. A customer representative said that the company took out six reels to deliver a better product, and that toilet paper was actually thicker than it was before. Manufacturers have also increased their brand offerings to include not only one and two rolls, but mega, triple, and jumbo variations, and other sizes. This makes the comparison of products even more confusing. Some rollers are so bulky they may not even fit their bathroom housings, especially those in older homes. Don't worry, tell charmin's makers. Brand mega rolls come with a money back guarantee if they don't fit. So be sure to hold on to your receipt and UPC code just in case you need to request a refund. Our advice: Do not rinse the money in the sewers. Find a brand you like and stock when it's on sale. Check out our toilet paper purchase guide. Since 2009, Consumer Reports has tested bathroom tissue several times. And during this period, many manufacturers have shrunk the size of their rolls. To assess the difference, nine current products were looked at, comparing the number of sheets per roll and the size of the pages with previous versions. In most cases, we used the so-called double roller as our benchmark, which is the most popular size. Note that some brands, such as Kirkland Signature, will reduce the number of rolls per package. As companies shave pages, they expand the product scopes. The king of line extensions is Angel Soft. According to its manufacturer, Georgia-Pacific, there are seven roll sizes, 132-528 sheets. (Six are pictured here.) The reason this is a choice? According to a customer service representative, they are just different price points. But John T. Gourville, a marketing professor at Harvard Business School, says it's hard to corner the market. One problem is the shelf he draws attention. By spreading sizes, you increase the likelihood that the consumer will randomly buy toilet paper or shampoo to buy their own brand. And by being a good-selling brand, you can command more shelf space and take it away from a competitor. Packaging can be said to be flushable or safe for sewers and septic pipes. But after testing, we ask for disagreements. It took at least 10 minutes for the napkins we tested to break down into small pieces of our mixer filled with water, which provides more churning than waste pipes. When we left the wipes in the water for the night, some fell apart, some didn't. Find it by pulling together. Don't use your toilet as a garbage basket. Toss used trash cans. The same advice applies to tissues and paper towels. The benefits of toilet paper Septic Safe Consumer Reports toilet paper are an indispensable item in any laundry room.
