The easiest category to put CHON in is instrumental, but it doesn't do the band justice. In its debut full-length glow, CHON incorporates prong rock and jazz with lightning quick picking, staccato drumming and buoyant melodies to create a fresh, exciting and completely unique sound. (They add vocals to a couple songs, can't wait and echo.) Grow's songs have some complexity, but the band's approach to writing music is simple and organic. We enjoy writing music like this, says guitarist Mario Camarena. We don't take it too seriously. It's just music that we write naturally. We want people who enjoy ours to have fun listening to us, the guitarist best known as a member of the American progressive rock band Chong. Mario Camarena, guitarist for the progressive band CANON in San Diego, is just hanging out and getting ready at lido, a pretty popular shopping area in Bangkok, Thailand, when our call was tied. The band was trying to play the show late at night, and being in Thailand by phone from his home in the US (hence the bad reception), it was sometimes difficult to decipher everything others said at both ends. But one of the powerful things that made ring clearing was Mario's love for a man called Stephen Tarrant, a Sydney-based solo musician. In his words, Mario said the solo musician from Sydney was a great guitar player. I've known him (Stephen) through the internet for years. Actually, the last time we played in Australia, he was playing one of our shows in an open band. So it's cool to see him again and play with him * From my understanding, you actually come to Australia before the tour and support between the burial and me. That's pretty cool! Yes. We were open for a friend [between burial and me] playing for the first time in Australia. It was really cool - I remembered San Diego. Beach, weather. It was like that. Treats that we will be back to do our own headline tour in Australia. To actually meet the locals and play a little more, it would be better to actually focus more on the city and the fans. Yes! I'll also have a few days off in Brisbane, so I'll have to play there shortly before the tour starts. I remember the last time I was in Australia. 【2016】 We weren't very used to international travel and didn't have much time to adjust. So I don't think we were doneOur sleep schedule is done correctly. So I didn't see much outside of Perth because the whole Australian tour was really tiring. We actually spent the day there and did a few things, got to the aquarium (Chuckle). Oh cool! So let's talk about you all being from San Diego. From previous interviews you've done, it seems that the San Diego scene you grew up with was a real hub for metal bands. Is that right? Yes. In San Diego almost, there was a big metal scene - yes. I think it's changed over the years. I honestly don't keep up with what's going on there. Anyway, the music scene is not that big. Los Angeles (LA) is near San Diego and LA is where all the music is happening. I just had to say there's no big music scene in San Diego, he says, using the Australian example because it's unheard of of musicians to say Perth will smash Australia a lot or tour. They have so far been geographically separated from Sydney, Brisbane and Adelaide. Where east coast tours happen. Interesting parallel lines. Yes, yes. I do not know... From what I've heard from my musician friends from Australia, I've been told that there are so many cities I can tour in Australia. Usually on the east coast, and Perth (Chuckles). Quite a bit even Adelaide has a lot of struggles from the side. It's another thing an Adelaide band is trying to get out of, and even an overseas band is different. Australia is geographically isolated, so the band finds it difficult to come to Perth, not just Adelaide internationally. Definitely. In the state, it is very common to tour by car. No matter where you come from, just drive through the tour. So it will be a little easier for the band because you can drive with your equipment and everything. In Australia, it seems more common to fly between different spots, I can see difficulties for bands that just start. Yep, sure! I think we, too, australian bands working hard to make it have a mentality of we're going to do a big national tour. There is also an authentic tour van culture here. Its a DIY aspect to at least get started. Yes! [The reception goes to cut out for a minute or so], so I'll take a little step back from that and go back to some of the unique collaborations you've done over the years, especially some of your latest records. He could be in Australia now. I know he did some shows there this month. He's a really cool, experimental electronic music producer. He's super.I know that as well as producing, he is a songwriter and rapper and he also makes movies. What is it about him that excites me at the prospect of potential collaboration? There's no potential collaboration or anything. He is one of our favorite artists that we dream of collaborating with one day. We don't know him or anything, we've never talked to him, but we grew up listening to his music. He has a huge impact on us, so collaborating with one of your biggest influences is always a goal. It's the ultimate thing. Dig a little deeper and step into reality for a bit. What kind of relationship do you want your working relationship with FlyLo to have, given that you know him and what he does? I want you to work with him, collaborate with him, enjoy the two of you, and basically be yourself. I think it's the best way to make a collaboration. When each artist is trying to make something real and cool yes, definitely. I've talked to artists who have continued their dream collaborations in the past, but then they look back on it and it's like, Oh, who thought my idol wasn't actually. And when it comes to collaboration, there are work relationships that can be different. But hopefully it happens with you and FlyLo, man. Yes, it would be really cool, that's what we thought with our band [Chong]. It's hard to work with a band that's our fans and we really like them, but they're hard to work with. That's a strange thing.. * * Interview by Geneva Gao Grab tickets to Chung's second Australian tour here - Australia Tour 21st @StayGold, Melbourne 22nd @Crowber, Sydney 23rd @JiveBar, Adelaide 25th February @AmpBar, Perth Tickets here
