Background StoryMadfinger Games has recently made the Android version of Dead Trigger free due to piracy. According to what we have stated, illegal downloads are so high that the software house seems to be able to earn practically anything. Several times we've shared the vulnerabilities associated with the applications published on Google Play. However, another major problem with the Google online store relates to the illegal downloads of the software. Users can get an item for free which should instead be purchased by paying actual money. Madfinger's decision to make Dead Trigger completely free has caused quite a stir, because of the aforementioned problem. It does not allow the company to profit from sales. For those un familiar with it, Dead Trigger is one of the flagship shooters in the App Store with interesting graphics. During the game, kill as many zombies as to survive the many waves. Madfinger wants to emphasize that this action is not a commercial or marketing practice, but has been dictated by the countless dangerous practices of users. Therefore, the software has not been free with the presence of additional in-app purchases to complete the experience. The situation in the App Store is very different. The game remains at the current price with optional in-app purchases. Although Apple users seem to be spending money to proceed with the purchase legally, piracy also exists in iOS, but not at the same level as Android.Other realities have complained, claiming that a real anarchy reigns in Google Play. For example, Sports Interactive has stated that the sale of Football Manager 2012 for Android does not exist. They have pointed out that there is a 9:1 relationship between applications that are illegally downloaded and purchased. For each version purchased regularly from the store, there are nine received in a free and illegal way. Despite everything, the situation about Dead Trigger seems to have dissatisfied many iOS users. The hope is that the company, highly valued by the public, can somehow apologize to its games by offering the application on a free offer for a day.
