The gremlin species that skips into the content is a legend in the cycling community. The guardian is said to protect you from evil spirits that plague your way. They come in all kinds of designs and can be put on motorcycles at various points. The species is said to work by capturing souls and making them angry by constant ringing. Then return to the road or pit to find the next victim. Hopefully the next rider does not have a bell. Gremlin species have a strong tradition in the Harley community, but other riders are encouraged to fend off evil spirits. Guardian Bell rules It must be a gift from Rider and not bought for yourself to work properly. The bell must be attached to the lowest part of the frame. You want your species to be the closest to road demons. Some species can come with a mount or use a zip tie. Remove guardian bells when selling bikes, or hand it face-to-face to the new owner. The origin of the species is that no one knows where the story began. Some say World War II pilots used them for luck. There's also a story that cyclists in the 1950s used to be security officers to know when someone was trying to steal a bike. One thing remains true, the legend remains very popular. You want to be the one to invite the road gremlins?. In full page refresh, pressing the arrow keys to press the resulting space key #3 has been much discussed, new people in this traditional usual ask the logical question: Where do you put the motorcycle bell? Traditionally, species were hung as low as possible without hitting obstacles, but many cyclists no longer seem to pay much attention to this rule. They can hang it anywhere from the fork down the front to the license plate. It depends on your personal taste, and, well, exactly how superstition and traditional you are. There are a lot of different very specific rules, probably a lot of different bikes know about different rules. It's like all folk stories and beliefs – they incorporate the beliefs of other individuals to incorporate them into traditions, and change over time. For example, they say that not only do fellow cyclists have to hang bells on their bikes, but they shouldn't touch them at all until they're on the bike. Alternatively, you can't get a bell as a gift until you've traveled at least 100 miles. Or, some say, there are certain rules that retire species and pay respect. Obviously, you need to get a mason jar and put a motorcycle bell on it. Then it should be covered, closed and put on a shelf with a quarter of a gallon of motorcycle oil. They say the oil will keep the gremlins away, and the bell will get a peaceful resting place. In any case, as motorcycle club culture and community gained popularity, many accessory manufacturers started. Create and sell motorcycle bells. Contrary to the strong original belief that motorcycle species should not be purchased, given only as gifts from other fellow cyclists, the manufacturer has found a way around the story. Buying a species for yourself is completely fine, because it actually has enough protective power to keep you safe. But when given as a gift, the protective superpower is doubled. So if buying a motorcycle bell and giving it up as a gift has double abilities, the handmade species should definitely have triple protection! So, have you ever thought about making one yourself and giving it to a dear friend to keep them safe? If you have the right tools with your skills, put making a bell at the top of the list! Superstition - Are we as vryst as riders? Of course, I've visited fairy bridges on the Isle of Man in the past when TT racers go to greet fairies and greet them to keep them safe from bad fates. Motorcycle racers have been recorded as being attractive to perform superstition rituals, dress or keep them safe. Valentino Rossi's well-known ritual is the disturbing sight of a man adjusting his underwear as he crouches next to his bike band as if shaking hands with a bike before he gets on board, or seeing what he's included there riding out on the track. Something that can unsettle our neighbors as we take the road. All this appears to try to get lady luck and good omens by your side, but what about the dark side, those signs and souls out there that you do mischief and harm? Then step forward the legend of Guardian Bell protecting riders from evil road spirits. Legend comes from the fact that, like all legends, cities or folklore, the story takes many forms but will stop evil spirits when the Guardian bell is attached to a motorcycle. Legend has it that an evil road soul has been caught on a motorcycle as long as the bike is on the road. These souls are responsible for mechanical problems and bad luck in travel. Legend says that by attaching a guardian bell to a bicycle, the evil spirit will be trapped inside the guardian bell. There, constant ringing will drive them crazy, and they lose their grip until they fall to the ground. Legend has the devil www.guardianbell.com on a motorcycle as long as there is a bike on the road – according to the City Dictionary. This evil road spirit is responsible for mechanical problems and bad luck along the journey. Legend has it that by attaching a small bell to a bicycle, an evil road soul would be trapped inside a mad-driven bell, making them a constant ringing Lose grip until it falls to the ground. (Wondering where the hole came from?) Legend also has the mystery of the Guardian® carries double the power when bought by a friend or loved one and given as a gift. Biker Nation tells the full story of the legend - the story is of an old grey-bearded cyclist who travels home late at night on a road trip to Mexico. His saddle bag had gifts and trinkets for the children who lived in the orphanage where he worked. Riding alone in the cool desert air, he felt blessed with his life, the children at home, his biker friends and, most importantly, the bikes that didn't disappoint him. He spent a mile on the highway on this bike, and the two bonded, as only cyclists could understand. As he howled along the high desert, the full moon lit up in the sky, and the silhouette of the cactus cast an eerie shadow along the desert floor, unaware that the old gray beard had climbed a few kilometers up the road and waited for the next victim's intention: a tough little group of road gremlins. Road gremlins are evil little creatures that leave obstacles in your path - old mufflers, rubber pieces, boxes, diesel fuel, and invisible objects that cause you to move your tires flat or break chains or belts. They also chased animals and deer into the path of a suspected cyclist. The only purpose of road gremlins is to create cyclist crashes... Add a notch to their small belt. They are small pieces of evil and dirty creation. As the cyclists rounded the curve, the road gremlins ambushed him, causing him to crash and slide. He awoke in a ditch, barely alive. Nearby was one of the saddle bags that ripped off the bike. The cyclist was lying there, helpless and unable to move as the road gremlins began to move to finish him off. The old grey beard didn't give up easily and I started throwing things out of my saddle bag. Finally, he had nothing to throw at the little bell and started ringing it..... To their surprise, the tincture sound seemed to confuse the gremlins, and they stopped attacking. The old cyclist was encouraged, but he was still in a bad way. He didn't know how long the bell would stay on the gremlins, and the gremlins were between him and his bike, and there was no way to make a quick getaway. Not far away, by chance two other cyclists stopped to make camp at night. They were riding about 30 miles behind an old cyclist and stopped in front of a curve at the crash site, so they were unaware of the crash. While they were being dismantled, they heard bells ringing and ringing. Thinking it was a strange thing to hear in the middle of the desert, they quickly They came to visit an old cyclist in a ditch and the gremlins surrounding him. Vengefully, and without worrying about their own safety, two bikers attacked a gang of road gremlins, killing several and scaring the rest. The old cyclists appreciated their help and gave money to the saviors, but they didn't accept any payment. The old cyclist wanted to express his gratitude, and the two cyclists didn't leave without doing something for good. The old biker cut two pieces of leather from the saddle bag tassel and tied the bell to each piece. He then placed the bell on two biker bikes as close to the ground as possible. The old cyclist told his new friends that he could be protected from road gremlins with a bell attached to his bike, and that if he had a problem, he would ring the bell and his fellow cyclists would get help. So whenever there's a cyclist with a bell, he'll know that he's blessed with the most important thing in life: the friendship of a fellow cyclist. Others believe that gremlins live on motorcycles because they love riding motorcycles and are the cause of most cyclists' problems, such as when tires flatten. Evil road spirits can not live near the species because they are trapped in the hollows of the species. Their hearing is irritable, so constant ringing in a limited space make them crazy. They lost their grip and eventually fell onto the road. That's how holes are formed. If you buy your own species, the magic still works, but if you get one as a gift from a friend or loved one the magic will double somewhere because you have a friend looking for you. If you steal a bell from a cyclist, you steal all the gremlins and evil that comes with them. Stealing a bell is a bad thing, and the consequences can be terrible. As with everything in life - there are regulations and guidelines ruled out by bike country and the BikeBandit blog: Bell's rules should not be purchased by users - they must be given to the rider of a loved one to work. According to legend, the paper is activated by a gesture of goodwill when someone, especially another rider, gives it to a rider of interest as a gift. Be connected to the lowest part of the frame. Since gremlins hide on the road and catch on passing bicycles, low-hanging species must be caught immediately as they must be the first thing they come into contact with. Safety wires are sometimes used, but they can create rust and scratches, so house ties are usually the preferred method. If you sell a bike with a bell, you need to remove it. Gremlin Bell is a gesture of kindness from the person who cares about them to the rider. It must be stored by the intended recipient and can be moved to another bike. If someone wants to sell a bike with a bell and a new rider has a bike, they still have to remove it and provide it face-to-face. Species that are not given by intentional goodness will lose their spirit-fighting mojo. If someone steals a gremlin bell, the gremlins go with it - the species no longer wards them off. The key to the power of the species is goodwill. If it is stolen, it loses its effect... And karma will take care of the rest! Maybe you're not a superstition, maybe you think bar! What a load of bunkum! But maybe, on the back of a sub-consciousness hidden along with the childhood belief that there are monsters under the bed, there is a slight niggles that the legend can have some semblance of a true story... There is a risk value that you don't believe in! Of course, if you believe in all this, wouldn't you take risks without Guardian Bells? Bell?
