Oregon nursing license login

Nurses who want to work in another state must obtain a state nursing license before seeking employment. Most state nursing boards offer nursing licenses on the basis of reciprocity or confirmation to nurses who have already passed a certification exam and have an active and current license in at least one state. Nurses must be in good condition in their previous state with a satisfactory background. Complete the application for approval. Download the form from the State Board of Nursing website or contact the authority to provide a paper form by mail to you. In some countries, you can complete and submit an application online. Visit your local law enforcement agency to have your fingerprints taken for background checks. If you are already resident in the state to which you are transferring your license, you can send digital fingerprints through LivesCan. Send your application to the nursing board in the state to which you are transferring. Enter the fingerprint card, the processing fee and all other required documents. Download the verification form from the website of the State Council to which you are applying and download it to the current State Council. Let the employees finish it and send it to the office you're applying to. Some state boards are registered in NURSYS, a website that provides authentication for members. If your current State Council and the State Council you are applying to are members, then you can log into the database and verify the license yourself for a modest fee. If necessary, take the test of case law. This test tests candidates based on their knowledge of the state practice of the law for the profession. Wait for the decision of the State Council. The processing time depends on the time the board must wait to receive your background check information from the FBI. If the board finds that you are eligible for a license, it may issue a temporary license that allows you to take up employment while waiting for a permanent license.
