Warning: coffee can be hot ... Warning: your child may harm themselves by jumping out of the playground... Warning: Antifreeze may be fatal if swallowed. I always thought these warnings were endemic to the United States, dating back to 50 years of a process-seeking society out of control. Was I ever wrong. Apparently Japan shares america's propensity to state the obvious in warnings, and then some. Check out these real warning images from the Japanese Nintendo Wii manual: Warning: don't eat Wii twist tie: Warning: don't wear pink shirts, while playing Wii: Warning: don't hit your friend in the face with a Wiimote: Warning: suffocating yourself with wii bag is not fun: Warning: your Wii doesn't need a blanket to keep warm: Warning: your Wii is not, and will never be, thirsty: Warning: your Wii isn't hungry either: I think American consumers would actually read warning labels if accompanied by pictures this amusing.
