(This year we had a lot of controversy about it in the news). Also prod them further asking Why is this such an important holiday? And what does a day's vacation do? (Most students can't really answer why this is a vacation, but it takes their interest in what comes next) Then I give them the goal and share that today we will compare and contrast the two different articles we read yesterday about Christopher Columbus to assess whether we agree or disagree whether Christopher Columbus really discovered America and whether we should celebrate this holiday. Before I have students get their thoughts again, I like to turn on their previous knowledge and review what turned out to be facts and opinion-biased statements in christopher columbus's articles. (I want them to know that most of what was reported is based on facts, but that good readers evaluate the author's perspective (bias) along with the source of the article about how specific the facts are) Here's where I need them to understand where Columbus came from and where it ended up on all its travels – so you can either pass out maps and have them track the paths or maps of the project and follow them with you. (depends on your lesson schedule) To offer a good argument we must first get the facts on the subject and then back up what we say with evidence (builds value on the next assignment) That's where I introduce (re-introduce for some) the comparison/contrast chart. Still at the beginning of the year so I frontload the questions I want to answer. I respond to the first resemblance to them and look for strong facts/evidence that support the claim and want to write in the context of the facts. This course varies, so sometimes I have to do a second or even a third section to get students understanding how and where to find them elements for each in the text. Once they get it they let them work independently to identify the rest and answer the final question I let them finish their worksheets and move the struggling students to the collaborating or small groups to complete the survey. Some struggled with identifying the strongest conversation in the pass because of lower reading ability – I had groups shared verbally and in writing to help with what I set the timer for for minutes (and adjust to 15 if needed) to give everyone time to complete the graphics setup. Then I have answered them the focus question with their views on whether or not the facts justify the holiday. Having discussions earlier helped the ELL and struggling students complete this section. I give about 10 minutes for this because of a lack of classroom time, but a longer period of time would be better to encourage strong convincing answers. This is important because this is where students have the opportunity to discuss what they feel with their data from the text on whether or not they should celebrate the holidays (according to the facts given). If I observe an equal distribution to those who agree and to those who disagree with them I have taken sides and held a group discussion with each side that raises an issue and the other disagrees with the evidence. I am usually the judge and the jury;) and I decide who gave the best argument - winner comes out first for lunch or gets a treat! This time we carved out their answers and had the class decide which presented the best argument. Be warned that if the argument goes to the holidays is not justified – you need an alternative plan for this holiday (you even renamed Lief Erikson Day a year and followed the trip to reading writing and math) Higher students can be challenged to come up with more evidence for each side of the discussion and glue their evidence into a graph document to determine the consensus of more than one academic source – it's a very good way to teach research skills at the same time. Finally, finally by giving a positive to Christopher asking -Manuals have stated that Christopher Columbus opened the door to travel to the New World. - What are your thoughts on this? (this takes them back to thinking about the purpose of this unit –the benefits we gained from each exploration) Students will find the video interesting and engaging. Who really discovered America.
