Wix air filters near me

Any engine operating by internal fuel combustion requires air to operate. This is because without air, specifically oxygen, fuels such as gasoline and diesel cannot burn and provide the explosive force to power the engine. The trick is that not any old air will do. In modern cars, air must be cleaned before it is sucked into the engine air intake plenum and combustion chambers. If not, you run the risk of dust, dirt and debris quickly dirtying the engine, causing poor performance and potentially shortening the life of the car. Foreign particles act as abrasives on the metal parts of an engine, wearing down motor bearings, piston rings, and cylinders. Advertising In addition, modern engines are based on a precise relationship between air and fuel. When the engine is hungry for air, the fuel mixture is said to be running too rich, which in effect puts additional stress on the engine. Fortunately, we have engine air filters that allow just the right amount of air from the gulleets of our vehicle engines, while trapping the sand that would hurt our engines. But even the best air filter can withstand only, but so much abuse of the outside environment. So how do you know, as a car owner, when is it time to change the air filter? Everything depends, as is usually the case with the parts of the car, on the force with which the car is driven and under what conditions. If the car sees a lot of use in dusty and harsh conditions (think of driving the city with a lot of construction underway), then the most frequent changes of the air filter are in order. If, on the other hand, you turn out to be Pasadena's proverbial old lady who only drives on Sundays, you can get away with less frequent air filter replacements. Some experts recommend changing the air filter with the frequency of every 3,000 miles (4,828 kilometers), along with changing the oil [source: 2CarPros.com]. Others say it's a little too excessive and you should simply use your judgment in visually checking air filter stains and change it when it looks dirty. Your best option, of course, is to consult the owner's manual or a model-specific guide from an editor like Haynes or Chilton for the vehicle in question. Then follow the manufacturer's recommendations on the type and frequency of the replacement filter. General Motors, for example, suggests for many of its vehicles, to change the air filter at the 60,000-mile (96,561-kilometer) mark. But an automotive expert said that because of where he drives, he changes the air filter of his own vehicle every two years or 24,000 miles (kilometers) - what happens first [source: Torbjornsen]. In any case, it is a smart and proactive policy to inspect at least the air filter every 6,000 miles (9,656 kilometers). It costs nothing to look at, and could save you from costly repairs along the way! For more information about air filters and other related topics, follow the links on the next page.
