Fake plastic engagement rings

Picture: Zero Creatives/Cultura/Getty Images Engagement is the first and most exciting stage for getting married. It's a starting gun, the start of the race. You mean who you say first when you post a photo on Instagram or Twitter first, and who you invite to your wedding. Commitments are the first example of a couple planning something that, by definition, affects them for the rest of the day. Even if wedding planning falls on one side or the other side of the couple, or if the wedding planner is hired, the commitments give the couple their first chance to collaborate on something that includes everyone they know, exhibiting their tastes, and even food choices. Engagement rings are objects that mark this period and remind us of it every time we see it. Engagement rings are also a sign of how things went during engagement. If the couple weren't particularly well off, the ring can be very minimalist, and if the couple had recently enjoyed a casual, it can be huge and dressed up. In their hearts, engagement rings are an expression of eternal feeling and so expensive or not that their design must reflect something deeper about the pair. It's also a relic-making, precious piece of jewelry that can be passed down through generations-as long as you take proper care. While you may (err, should) already know to avoid opening boxes or trying to pop bottle tops into your sparkler (believe us, people don't try), there are some unexpected, everyday activities that can put your ring in harm's way. We consulted experts Debra Dolphin and Elizabeth Woolf-Willis for their best advice on what to do and what to avoid to keep your ring in a lovely life. Meet Expert Debra Dolphin is a jewelry expert, graduate gemologist and customer service manager at Blue Nile, an online diamond and engagement ring retailer. Elizabeth Woolf-Willis is a certified gemologist and marketing coordinator for Simon G. and Zeghani Jewelry. Any action that involves the impact on your hands (from contact sports such as volleyball weightlifting) can bend or break the branches that hold your rock in place, causing it to fall off its device. Similarly, experts warn wearing it as water activities such as swimming, water skiing, or boating because it's much easier for your ring to slip when your hands are wet. I've heard so many stories about rings getting lost in lakes and oceans, Woolf-Willis says. Even walking or jogging can put your ring into contact with the elements. If you work out a lot, consider a rubber or silicone ring so you don't have to worry at all. According to Dolphin, the usual cleaning material does not damage your diamond (delicate pearls are another thing). During cutting, the stones are cleaned with acidification. This makes them waterproof for chemicals, he says. However, household cleaners such as bleach and common chemicals, such as acetone nail polish remover and chlorine from pools, can also inhibit alloys in precious metals. So to be safe, it makes sense to take off your ring during cleaning (just be sure to put it in a safe place in the meantime). The same is true when you go swimming, because chlorine can seriously damage your gold or platinum band. Even if you are not wearing your ring during exercise, normal daily activities – such as fabric warts – can loosen the branches, putting the stone at risk of falling out. Our experts recommend regular checks by an experienced jeweler every six to 12 months to make sure the settings are secure. You can get your rings professionally cleaned at the same time. However, if you want to clean your ring yourself, our experts recommend using soft soap, warm water, and a soft bristle toothbrush or solution to five-piece water, one part ammonia (diamonds). And remember to never use a silver cleaner for something that isn't silver, Woolf-Willis says. your ring insured in case something happens is a good idea as well. PHOTO REBECCA YALE PHOTOGRAPHY If your fiancée puts that engagement ring on your finger, chances are you never want to take it off. We totally understand that. However, if you want your bling to continue shining bright for a really long time, it's important not to wear it when you're busy doing these seven things. To talk it down, we spoke with experts David Watling and Nadine Tacorian Arzerounian. Meet The Expert David Watling is the former head of the Diamond Center in De Beers.Nadine Tacorian Arzerounian is president of operations and design at Tacori. Here's where to take away your engagement ring if you want to keep it in mint condition. Before you break a sweat, it's a good idea to take that pretty little ring away. The materials used in diamond jewelry, platinum and gold are to some extent soft, explains Watling. So, if you rock your ring by participating in certain activities that put pressure on these metals, you risk changing your shape. If the shape of the ring is bent enough, then risk bending the claws that hold the diamond and its diamond to fall out, it continues. The same applies to sport. Any practical physical activity (football, basketball, tennis, etc.) are other great examples of when to take away wedding bands and engagement rings. Lotions and moisturizers can be great for your skin, but not as much for your ring, as excessive buildup can reduce the shine and dull your stone over time. To protect your stone and ensure a fuzzy layer of film doesn't form it, wait until your hands are completely dried before slipping your bling back. Did you know that cosmetics, hair sprays and perfumes can cause a build-up of gloom, weakening the natural gloss of your ring? Tacorian Arzerouniani says it's true. I take off my rings the moment I walk into my house so I can smoothly move through my night routine, she says. If you don't get any gloomy buildup on your engagement ring, Watling recommends gently rinsing it with hot water and dishwashing liquid. In doing so, don't forget to first secure the sink or use the bowl, he warns. Then dry the jewelry with cotton or linen before using a polishing cloth for foam washing. Never, ever wear your expensive jewelry in the ocean or pool. For one, cold water shrinks the fingers, making it much easier for an already loose engagement ring to disappear while swimming. This means that the ocean should be forbidden for battle rings. Like a pool, chlorine can damage and discoloration by mounting your ring and your platinum, gold, or white gold wedding band. Not only can you easily bang up your engagement ring on real surfaces (think bathroom counters, kitchen floors, etc.) while cleaning the house, you can also do serious damage to the stone and You can even potentially change color, thanks to harsh chemicals such as bleach and ammonia found in many common household cleaners. The last time you don't wear an engagement ring is cooking and food prep. Germs and bacteria can easily get presented in the ring setting. And like in the shower, you risk the ring if you flush something in the sink. If you can, it's better to take it off while cooking. If you've ever wondered if I can shower my engagement ring, you probably already felt the answer was no -and you were right. A shower can be a dangerous place for betting rings for two reasons. First, the ring can easily slip when your fingers are all lathered up and slippery soap and when the ring slips out, it can fall into the drain and get lost forever. Second, oily soaps bored finish your diamond and peeling soaps scratching it. When it's time to buy engagement rings, I probably know my partner well enough to narrow down the opportunity they'd like. But if you're not sure or are confused about marketing, we're here to help. Start early so you can order and customize your exact specifications. This is one of the first questions people think before deciding on a pop question, but the answer depends on the person who asks. Think about your partner's preferences and style. After all, minimalist may not be excited about lugging the big rock around. And consider your financial situation to avoid starting a marriage financially off before you leave the reception. Then maybe you want a joint! If so, you'll find ways to fund the engagement ring you've set in your heart. But don't forget: After the ring is out of the box and you've popped the question, there's still a wedding to pay for. Which finger should you wear an engagement ring? Engagement rings are traditionally worn with the fourth finger in the left hand. The finger of a female ring is a size 6 or 7, while the average man's ring finger size is between 8 and 10. Ask the jeweler about returning in case the ring is not suitable or the ability to size it would fit your partner's finger. Take a look at the rest of your partner's jewelry to learn what kind of metal they normally wear. If you buy yellow gold, say, and they only wear white gold, metal mismatch can be a problem for your partner. If your partner is already mixing metals, consider a multitone circle with more than one tone. Yellow gold is a traditional choice. Almost all jewelry retailers sell yellow gold rings, and you can get pretty much every stone or laying yellow gold. White gold is a popular choice for people who prefer silver but want the longevity and prestige of the gold ring. Almost all jewelers offer white gold, even if the screen ring that you like doesn't have it. Rose gold is The most popular choice, its pink hue offers a feminine look. Most stores carry this elegant alternative. When buying rose gold, make sure to ask if your ring is pure rose gold or plated. Plated rings can chip in and lose color with frequent wear and engagement rings should be durable enough to wear each day. What jewel should you choose? The best gemstone is the exciting part of picking out the ring. Not only do you have to decide whether your love is a traditional diamond or something like that person, but you can also test the color and find something that works in your price range. Maybe your future spouse is a little bolder and prefers onyx or pearl traditional gems. No matter what you do after, all these stones are incredibly popular and easy enough to find in stores. Make sure you buy an authentic gem and studies which stones are most durable. Pictures: PinterestRock cut type refers to the shape of the actual stone of the ring. Traditional rings are round or oval, but many cuts offer unique alternatives. Whatever style cut to choose from, look for a wedding band that fits it. Princess: square or rectangular inverted pyramid on profilepad: rounded corners square or modified round corners: elongated or modified round cutSquare: standard rectangular shapeTeardrop: rounded at the bottom of the topMarquise: shaped football or boat with sharp ends and wide middleHeart: standard heart shapeBriolettes: similar to tear cut, but more facettable: generally rectangular with step-like facetsEmerald : cut square shape with step-like facetRound: standard circular shapeTrille: triangular shape facetsNot traditionally , but there's no reason they can't! Many traditions related to weddings and commitments stem from the patriarchal period of history. But in a society that is much more opposed to a variety of masculinity and femininity, LGBTQIA+ marriage and universal gender equality, get your husband in the ring if that's your business. Pro tip: If your man is working outside, choose a ring made of titanium or tungsten. These metals are more durable than gold stand up to the rough work and time test. If you choose a diamond, commit to four Cs: cut, clarity, color and carat. Cut. The cut diamond affects its proportion and dispersion of light. Clarity. The specified number of errors in the diamond as seen with a strong magnification. Color. Diamonds are available in a variety of shades. A diamond that looks clear alone may look yellow next to a white diamond. Carat. Determined your weight and hinting at the rarity of the diamond. Your partner may be concerned about diamond mining and the ethical concerns that surround them. If so, consider an alternative stone or laboratory option.
