Unlike people in Europe and the United States, people in Japan often sit on the floor when they eat and relax. They usually kneeling, as is customary in Japan. But occasionally, people will sit upright when kneeling becomes too painful. For these occasions, Japanese designers have developed chairs that sit flat on the floor. Many of these chairs resemble chairs that you would find in the States or European countries. However, these chairs do not have legs. They come in different styles, but these chairs usually do not have hands. This leaves room for the user to sit cross-legged. The seat of the Japanese chair is similar to a pillow, which provides a padded pillow for the user. Interested in Japanese Design? Best Japanese Tatami ChairsOne specific style of floor chair is called tatami. The word comes from the Japanese verb, tatamu, which means fold. It makes sense how the oldest tatami chairs were mats made of bamboo. These mats fold like yoga mats, so they can be transported easily. Traditionally, they were made of the same bamboo, which was used to cover the floors of Japanese houses. The idea was to add a layer of pillow to the floor, which made it more comfortable for sitting. Today, tatami is used to refer to a number of different styles of chairs, not just mats (although many people still love tatami mats). There are tatami chairs that have backs, as well as traditional Western chairs that fold up for easy storage. Tatami's materials have changed, too. While some are still made of bamboo, other modern tatami mats are made of wood, plastic or woaden linen.
