I wondered how good it was to see these at Walmart for a while. When I found out I needed another charger, I decided to give this a try. When the battery is discharged below 60% (12.2 volts on a 12-volt battery), the L-O-N-G time charger read only displays Lo, and the time depends on the amplifier time evaluation of the battery. With a 3.0 amp (billing) charge rate and 13.6V, the large deep cycle group 31/105 Ah battery, which is lowered to 11.5 volts (&lt; 20% charge), will have a long wait, long wait time to fully charge. As a maintenance/casual charger (lead acid/AGM only), it's just OK (see lower side below), and the display shows exactly what it's doing. An additional plus comes with a solar system type (SAB) DC connector used by branded battery tenders, so it comes with a cable clamp pair for easy connection to any battery with this type of cable or for direct connection to the battery terminal. The AC cord is 6 feet long and the charging cable is 5 feet long, and both should reach most batteries without an extension cord. On the under side, except for the nits above, when I first got my stuff, the charger threw two very well charged AGM deep cycle batteries, one 95Ah, and another 35Ah some very strange cords (no manuals in the box). Now that the same battery is connected, it works as expected. Another problem. Things smell and it runs very warm. The smell is not of PCB material made of phenol or fiberglass, superheated flame-resistant ingredients, resist etch or wire cover (I know these smells and I know I spent years intimately troubleshooting IBM's assembly line). Elusive. Maybe flux? maybe flux wash? If you're sensitive to odors, I've had my stuff for over two months and the smell has not gone away at all, so leave this alone. I thought a small cooling fan would relieve heat and smell, but the muffin fan connected to the battery I was charging pulled ~450 milli amps and returned the charging state to 60%.While charging, the fan was connected to a spare 35Ah battery to inhale the air, resulting in a lower odor and case temperature. This indicates that the odor is a natural evaporation process/outgassing of something left during production, or an overly hot condition that indicates an imminent part failure at some point. With Walmart's usual $19 price, it's a good deal, but a little scary at the same time. In fact, I don't trust myself in a hot environment not to self-destroy. So far the start should do a better job of evacuating the heat from inside the case. I can offer my service in that regard I would buy another one? If I find the same problem, I'll probably get the second one back, so far I certainly wouldn't recommend it. If anyone else here had different results, I would like to hear your observations. PS, for the frame of reference, @12.2 volts (~60%) on my 95Ah battery when charging started and it took 7 1/2 hours to fully charge it, it's not bad. I don't use that battery on the boat anymore, so my little 35Ah battery won't hit with a big recharge time and I can use it the next day if I charge it overnight.
